¶ It is argued that the formation & outbreak of collective action in the socialist state are rooted in the institutional structure of the state-society relationship, rather than being an organized & rational mobilization of resources. The structure of the socialist state does not meet the assumptions about collective action made in democratic societies: ie, that the public & private spheres are separate & that individual activities in the private sector involve market-like transactions. Instead, state monopology of the public sphere fosters & reproduces large numbers of individual behaviors with similar claims, patterns, & target. Socialist state policy affects the behavior of all individuals simultaneously, even those in the workplace, making individual behaviors based on unorganized interests appear as "collective" action. Two case studies illustrate this collective action process in the People's Republic of China–the Hundred Flowers Period in 1957 & the student prodemocracy demonstrations of 1986. In the socialist state, noncompliance & apathy appear as "collective inaction" & have political overtones. 88 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Forms of contesting established power in the Arab world are outlined, discussing the development of pan-Arabism, struggles against colonialism, & the emergence of cultural & political identities. It is suggested that the Persian Gulf war revealed new & homogeneous protest modes, characterized by Islamic identification, defense of Arabism & Muslim holy places, & defense of the Palestinian cause. The articulation of pan-Arabism & pan-Islamism by fundamentalist movements varied according to national historical factors, as exemplified in three case studies: the Syrian constitution battle in 1973, the Cairo, Egypt, riots of 1986, & the situation in Algeria since 1988. Wright Mills's "Situated Actions and Vocabularies of Motive" (American Sociological Review, 1940, 5, 904-913) responses are analyzed in terms of goals & utopias, & both secular & religious dimensions of their responses are noted Various views of totality, including asceticism, quasi-religious, & ecological-moral, are typical for these environmental activists. 1 Appendix, 25 References. ¶ In an exploration of how challenging social movements produce institutional change, the concept of organizational repertoires is introduced. Groups marginalized by existing political institutions have an incentive to develop alternative models of organization. These alternative models, in turn, are more likely to be adopted by other political actors to the extent that they embody familiar, but previously nonpolitical, forms of organization. This argument is illustrated with an analysis of political innovation by women's groups in the US at the turn of the century. 118 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Interviews with 50+ leaders of civil rights efforts in 4 rural communities in the South suggest how narratives nurture political resistance among repressd & subordinated groups. Narratives provide group members historical precedents of individual & collective resistance, an alternative explanation of the group's condition, & an exposition of group virtues. The function of narratives as a formative element of local leadership & as an explicitly political element of social movements is discussed. Further, social movements are interpreted as a set of related local efforts of resistance & in terms of the spaces in which narratives occur. 1 Table, 39 References. Adapted from the source document. Das, Veena (School Economics U Delhi, 110007 India), Time, Self, and Community: Features of the Sikh Militant Discourse, Contributions to Indian Sociology, New Series, 1992, 26, 2, July-Dec, 245-259.

¶ The period 1981-1984–when Sikh leaders led a series of mass civil disobedience campaigns against the Indian government for the fulfillment of several demands, & when the Sikh use of terror & violence began to be defended–is the focal point of an examination of the construction of the Sikh militant discourse in Punjab. As part of the political language being evolved by the militant movement to create a politically active group & to forge an effective unity among the Sikhs, this discourse seeks to build an effective political agency in the context of the modern state structures in India. An analysis of written & oral discourse draws on prominent Sikh publications & on lectures given by Sikh militant leaders. Results suggest that the written discourse strives toward a rational organization of ideas, its tone varying according to the assumed addressee; the oral discourse also addresses absent others (the state, in particular). The emotional role of several tropes–eg, synecdoche, irony, & metonymy–in the organization of such discourse has been noted in other scholarship & is well documented in the militant literature. The main features of the militant discourse (time, self, & community) are discussed. It is contended that the features specifically include: the use of rigorous dualism to define self & other; the creation of contemporaneity between noncontemporaneous events; the weaving of individual biography into social text through the use of local knowledge; & the justification of violence with reference to both mythological motifs & contemporary political practices. 7 References. ¶ In a review of recent literature & case studies on Latin American populism, the appeal of the populist leaders & the expectations & actions of their followers are delineated. It is argued that, despite the misuses & abuses of the term "populism," its complexities & ambiguities are worth preserving & redefining. Particular emphasis is placed on the social-historical analysis of collective action & on discursive political events. In addition, the concrete mechanisms of electoral articulation, in the context of particular political cultures, are examined. It is concluded that the principal effect of populism has been in providing access to a symbolic dignity for large groups in exclusive & racist societies. L. ¶ Feminist & new Left treatments of the politically charged decade of the 1960s not only fail to historicize the discord between the women's liberation movement & the new Left, but also tend to conceal the movements' common themes. Here, a remapping of the women's movement as an integral component of the 1960s is undertaken, & philosophical themes common to the new Left, the women's movement, & the black freedom movement are discussed. Several books on the 1960s are critiqued, including Todd Gitlin's The Sixties: Years of Hope, Days of Rage (New York: Bantam, 1989) & Tom Hayden's (Reunion: A Memoir (New York: Random House, 1988). It is shown that the new Left's dismissal of the women's movement as bourgeois & diversionary resulted primarily from the way that race & class became the exalted categories of 1960s radicalism. Future reconstructions of the decade should focus on locating radicalism within the social & cultural context of the postwar period. W. Howard

Although originating in various geographical areas, the authors of this group nevertheless share certain assumptions & concerns, including: the interest in local knowledge & culture as the basis for redefining representations; a critical stance with respect to established scientific knowledge; & the defense & promotion of localized, pluralistic grass-roots movements. The call of this group for the dismantling of "development" is discussed in the context of broader questions posed by the emergence of 1980s' & 1990s' social movements generally. ¶ Data obtained via structured interviews with 412 activists at a 1989 march in Washington, DC, are drawn on to profile characteristics of the active followers of the animal rights movement in the US. Typical respondents were Caucasian, highly educated, urban professional women, approximately age 30, with a median income of $33,000. Most activists think of themselves as Democrats or as Independents, & have moderate to liberal political views. They are often suspicious of science & make no distinctions between basic & applied science, or public vs private animal-based research. It is concluded that animal rights activism is, in part, a symbolic manifestation of egalitarian social & political views concerning scientific & technological change. 3 Tables, 2 Figures, 41 References. ¶ An examination of the demobilization of the British peace movement after the peak of its mass acitivities in the 1980s illustrates how movements in decline manage ideological disorientation, internal disunity, & mass defection. The closure of the movement's political opportunity structure & increased internal competition caused it to retreat from mass street protest to small scale disruptions at military bases. This allowed the movement's main institutional ally, the Labour Party, to withdraw its political support, thus ending the campaign. 5 Figures. Adapted from the source document.

¶ In the 1960s, Americans established 1,000+ communes, which expired after an average of 2 years. Four sustained, self-sufficient utopias--the socialist kibbutzim in Israel, the anarchist-inspired Mondragon complex of Spain, the Christian Bruderhof of NY, & the Quaker-led Monteverde community of Costa Rica--are explored, & reasons given for their success. Portraits were gleaned from participant observation for some 20 years, interviews with 50 members per commune, historical records, anthropological accounts, & daily experiences in the commune. Results show that the successful utopias, when compared to 1,000 US communes studied by Benjamin Zablicki (The Joyful Community, Baltimore, Penguin Books, 1971), exhibited the following traits, they: had survived for at least four decades; had economic viability; were self-governed & self-sustaining in membership; proposed a clear, universal message; & assured the material welfare of their members. 3 Tables, 19 References. In the twentieth century, four successive waves of thinking about revolution can be identified; Aya's book represents the fourth. Aya attempts to redefine the revolutionary phenomena as composed of three distinct areas: intentions, outcomes, & situation. He critiques & dismisses "volcano" theorists, & then presents an alternative methodological approach, a political model characterized as vicarious problem solving, with human players making rational choices in given conjunctural situations. Aya's rational choice approach is valid for analyses of late twentieth-century Central American & other Third World revolutions, but neglects the ethical/mythical dimension of revolution. M. Pflum

Perelli, Carina, Settling Accounts with Blood Memory: The Case of Argentina, in Social Research, 1992, 59, 2, summer, 415-451.

¶ The politics of memory tends to be a crucial factor of social stability in poor countries like Argentina, which are heavily indebted & on the brink of social conflict. Argentina's attempt to come to terms with the memoria de sangre (blood memory) of the guerra sucia (dirty war) against subversion, begun during the Videla government in 1976 through legal proceedings against both the guerrilla & the military, is delineated here as a social, political, & cultural failure. Why the Alfonsín government, which came to power in 1983, failed in its attempts to punish the former military juntas & limit the potential powers of the institution is examined, along with implications for Argentina today. It is concluded that the Alfonsin plan left behind a military institution almost destroyed by internal divisions, organizations of good & courageous people who were forced into partisan politics, a disabused & skeptical society, & thousands of victims whose deaths were in vain. The disappearance of the local in favor of the spatial & global is discussed, & new forms of communication engendered by new technologies are explored. Also considered is the tendency of new communication technologies to give rise to value pluralism to alter significantly the way the subject apprehends him/herself. Results demonstrate that youth in all 4 grades believe that frequent activity results in beneficial physical outcomes. Younger respondents are more likely to affirm external physical outcomes than either internal physiological or psychological outcomes, while older adolescents were more likely than children to affirm internal physiological outcomes; in contrast to hypotheses, adolescents are less likely than children to affirm psychological outcomes. Beliefs about the effect of various harmful behaviors on physical fitness & ability are also examined, revealing that abusive behaviors (eg, smoking, drinking) are judged more harmful to physical ability than are sedentary behaviors (eg, not exercising). 1 Table, 2 Figures, 47 References. ¶ An examination of the relationship between feminism & nationalism within a framework of a gendered cultural relativism–a perspective that puts women at the center of knowledge but contextualizes women's experiences to their culture. Feminism & nationalism coincide under at least three kinds of social conditions: as historical national liberation social movements; as identity rights movements; & as current decolonization movements against neocolonialism. Historical cases of the melding of feminist & nationalist ideologies in comparative perspective are examined with an in-depth focus on a contemporary feminist-nationalist movement in the Philippines. From these cases, themes emerge that demonstrate cross-cultural links between the various movements. In the reconceptualiztion of feminism as including some forms of nationalism, cultural values can be accounted for within feminist ideology. A gendered cultural relativism can identify points of struggle between feminisms that can make possible a universal feminist discourse without glossing over aspects of culture that make a universal feminism difficult. 64 References. On the other hand, feminism & psychoanalysis are moving into a period of greater range & richness, particularly with respect to the topic of sexuality & the experiences of people who oppress & are oppressed in the mediums of race, class, & gender. ¶ Data from the 1986 American National Election Study Post-Election Survey for a sample of African Americans (N = 146-313 respondents to each of 4 equal-opportunity questions) are used to explore their opinion toward these issues using a demographic-attitudinal focus. Results suggest that attitudinal forces, particularly core values, play an influential role in policy support. These patterns of values reflect those expressed by whites on similar questions: the more individualistic & conservative one is, the less likely one is to support government intervention on African Americans' behalf. In responding to questions concerning governmental responsibility, higher socioeconomic status (SES) African Americans express stronger support than do their lower SES counterparts. This suggests that those who are experiencing "glass ceilings" are concerned about government guarantees of equal opportunity, despite their individualistic beliefs. This is inconsistent with previous analyses of such beliefs among disadvantaged populations. The implications of social changes in the African-American community & the impact of these changes on opinion dynamics are discussed. 5 Tables, 3 Appendixes, 20 References. ¶ To examine the opinion of citizens toward displaced Croatian war refugees, questionnaire data were obtained from 200 people in northwestern Croatia largely unaffected by the war for independence from Yugoslavia except for the large influx of homeless refugees. A panel of 20 experts evaluated respondents' (Rs') evaluations of 24 statements expressing opinions about the refugees. Analysis reveals that age & type of community (urban/rural) have no effect on Rs' evaluations; rather, their ideas seem to be highly individualistic. Initial support for the homeless is now beginning to fade as the standard of living falls for the whole Croatian population The government's strategy in caring for the refugees must not depend solely on emotional support from citizens of other areas; practical, long-term solutions are needed that will not be burdensome on the indigenous residents of this area. 4 Tables, 6 References. ¶ Reported are results of 14 nationwide public opinion polls among Poles, Slovaks, Hungarians, & Czechs conducted 1989-1992 by the US Information Agency (N = 800-1,200 respondents per group). Results attest to a process of disillusionment with postcommunist regimes, & to disappointment with the progress of democracy. Levels of trust, sense of political efficacy, interest in politics, & support for liberal democratic values are examined & related to several determinants, eg, education, optimism, & economic outlook. It is suggested that support for a society focused on individual opportunities rather than on state-centralized guarantees may increase with an increase in higher education. 7 Tables, 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 44 References. ¶ The notion of intellectual property reifies economic rationalism as a natural human trait & assumes that, without mechanisms such as copyrights & patents, humans would cease to be intellectually & artistically creative. Here, the roots of this assumption are traced, combining theories from political economy & the cultural history of communications to locate the origins of the concept of literary property. Focusing on the modes & relations of production & communication, historical evidence suggests that the rise of capitalism & the dvelopment of the printing press were key precursors to the emergence of intellectual property law. Ways that such law serves as the basis for the enclosure of intellectual & cultural "commons" in contemporary GB & the US are discussed. 86 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The media construction of social problems in France is examined using the coverage of the violence in 1991 in the Lyon suburb of Vaulx-en-Velin as an example. It is emphasized that the media have the power to "create" the news, & to impose a dominant representation or view on those in the news, who have no control on their construction. The media highlight violent events; they do not investigate reality, nor present it accurately. This leads to stigmatization of areas & populations, especially, in this case, of North-African immigrants. Suggested are ways to achieve a less destructive media construction, eg, focusing on the suburb's history & the long-term reasons for the current problems. 3 Photographs. I. Shagrir

¶ In light of TV advertisers' concern about viewer "zipping" ie, fast-forwarding through commercials when playing a prerecorded or rented videotape, explored here is whether viewers evaluate commercials prior to zipping them. Data obtained in a pilot study involving 33 undergraduates from a large, northeastern university, & field research with 18 nonstudent adults from the same area, reveal high levels of zipping, reducing the audience size for commercials well below that for the programs. Block zipping, in which 2+ commercials were zipped at a time, was a predominant mode of zipping behavior. Zipping rates were lowest for the first commercial in the first pod, & highest for the commercials in the last pod. It is concluded that a majority of Ss zip to indiscriminately avoid all commercials, & that few attempt to evaluate commercials prior to zipping them. 3 Tables, 11 References. Relying on communications concepts from Jürgen Habermas, the structure of this debate is examined. The failure to find consensus in the debate & further develop the field is attributed to the: paradigmatic nature of the debate, strategic approach to communication by the major protagonists, & portrayal of validity claims as nondebatable. Given the incompatible ideologies, the critical discussion must continue if educational administration is to survive as a discipline. 50 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ While Plato would have been very interested in modern questions of children's education & its relationship to raising informed citizens capable of communication on a high level, the Platonic concept of dialogue is not to be confused with communication in the sense of modern mass communication. For Plato, dialogue not only informs the participants but also transforms them, so that in the end, the "I" & the "Thou" are no longer confronting each other, but rather, sharing in a newly emerging truth, a revelation of something previously hidden or forgotten. Most considered the shooting & the victim falling to the floor acceptable, but excluded images of the dead body. ¶ An investigation of public opinion (PO) in the mass media society, its meaning, & the problem of its measurement in attempt to track social change in modern societies. The most important mass media events are systematically investigated in 4 interregional, Swiss-German newspapers, both independents & those with political party tendencies, 1910-1992. PO, in this case bundled into mass media events, is therefore comparable from a synchronic & diachronic perspective, & as a result, an indicator for social change also emerges: the frequency with which the same events are debated over time form an orderly pattern which that corresponds with the sequence of phases of social crisis & structural phases in social change. Phases of crisis are times of intensified communication in the process of social change, during which there is an obligation–induced by conflict–to tackle the same themes, thereby providing the prerequisite for conflict-reducing discourse. This is carried out solely under pressure from problems of orientation in the face of a highly complex inner as well as outside world. The result is to a great extent contingent. The course of communication in public discussion is exemplified by several remarkable characteristics of public discourse during the crisis of the 1930s. 7 Graphs, 26 References. Benefits of successful research using these criteria are articulated. ¶ Novels filmed as TV series are considered as a new phase in the newspaper- & radio-series tradition. In Quebec, the TV series is currently the most popular form of novel consumption. After outlining the history of its growth in Quebec, the series "Caleb's Daughters" is used to exemplify the adaptation of the written novel to TV, comparing paragraphs from the book with TV dialogue. ¶ A contrastive analysis is presented of the impact of media policy on the structure of the broadcast system in Belgium & the Netherlands. Analysis of viewers' prime time preferences (N not specified) & public vs private TV offerings reveals that public service broadcasting structure & philosophy changed greatly as a result of political deregulation & economic demonopolization. Consequently, the organization, finance, & content of public service broadcasting were transformed by both internal & external factors. A "duopoly" was established in the late 1970s & 1980s in which the control was shared by public & private TV. For Dutch TV, this was a result of commercial factors. For Belgian TV, a difference was noted between Flemish regions, where political factors dominated, & Walloon regions, where a variety of factors were at play. 2 Tables, 47 References. ¶ A review of the existing literature indicates that whenever a new mass media technology appears, people eventually develop the ability to make sophisticated judgments about the reality depicted by that medium & to use what they see & hear to make judgments about social reality. While some progress has been made in discovering how people develop these skills & make these judgments, far more needs to be known. New technologies, eg, virtual reality, that can immerse the user in alternative realities are likely to make this an increasingly important issue & may provide new means for exploring these issues. 68 References. ¶ A proposed social cognitive model of argumentative & explanatory discourse (A&E) consists of a set of assumptions & hypotheses for reconstructing sociocultural attitudes & ideologies from ordinary A&E. It is assumed that socially shared knowledge representations have an important role in the production of A&E occurring in a broad sociocultural context. A&E are speech actions with functions entailing the use of sociocultural attitudes & ideologies, especially in group communication. It is hypothesized that the semantic categories of A&E are highly plausible slots for such social representations; such an analytic framework can serve as an efficient apparatus for identifying attitudes & ideologies. Interview data illustrate these concepts. 48 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ The Kibbutz Video Survey (Shinar, D., & Shur, S., Tel-Aviv: Kibbutz Movement Federation, 1986) included a study of 69 kibbutz community TV stations, a content analysis of 33 local programs, & 3 in-depth case studies in key figures in kibbutz programming. According to this study's findings, the kibbutz usage of VCR narrowcasting was in line with the basic model for community control over TV, & the basic prerequisites were met. Demand for internal participatory communication was present, & technological & capital resources were available. However, VCR narrowcasting in the kibbutz has not achieved its potential because of the lack of a clear conceptual framework, acute performance problems, a low level of institutionalization, & a lack of planning. Central kibbutz productions have attempted to imitate broadcast TV; production, transmission, & station operation have been casual; access to production has been selective; & kibbutz member participation in planning processes & decision making has been limited. To increase the effectiveness of narrowcasting in the kibbutz, the community model should be adopted, a systemic balance between technical & professional components should be achieved, & community narrowcasting should be delineated from broadcasting. 2 Tables, 40 References. ¶ Discussion of a realist analysis of the TV violence issue focuses on students' (N = 395 ages 9-15) accounts of TV narratives that raise the question of institutional violence in documentary & soap opera forms. Differences are considered by age, gender, & class in student discourses, & compared with data from structured questionnaires. Differences are found in the relation of the police to the "community" in the two TV texts used here. Significant class variations appeared regarding police roles as represented on TV. An account is presented of the discursive means by which students negotiate between traditional scripts for police & those represented in an alternative text. 30 References. ¶ An agenda for applied communication research with a focus on organizational theory can be generated by proposed guidelines for language, glossing, therapy, & relevance. Application as gloss stresses language & communication, while conceptual therapy becomes the application model. Relevance criteria are met by timely theories developed to deal with current issues. Pacing, simultaneity, & monologues are newly discovered communications phenomena arising during everyday life practices of fixing things by talk. Unexpected variations on standards in performed communication, eg, commitment, openness, gossip, renewal, & learning, are discussed. If the multiple determinants (affect, scale, hierarchies, improvisation, & confusion) assumed by applied researchers are weighted differently, the ensuing configurations of the communication space must be mapped & explained. Findings show that the movie increased awareness of date rape as a social problem across all demographic groups, & also had a prosocial effect on older Fs, who were less likely to attribute blame to Fs in date rape situations after exposure. However, the opposite effect tended to occur among older Ms. Results suggest that emotional involvement with a movie & selective perception of movie events may mediate the impact of social-issue TV programming. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, 49 References. ¶ It is suggested that booing by audiences in public speaking contexts represents a form of collective behavior that emerges within & has consequences for interactions between speaker & audience. Drawing on previous research on applause for comparison, analysis of data from US presidential debates & media talk shows indicates that applause & booing are coordinated by different mechanics of collective behavior. Applause usually begins promptly & its onset is coordinated primarily by audience members acting independently in response to prominent junctures in a speech. Booing is usually delayed & is coordinated primarily by audience members monitoring each other's conduct so as to respond together. This asymmetry between applause & booing is explained in terms of general structures of interaction as documented in previous research on affiliative & disaffiliative responses in ordinary conversation. 15 Extracts, 1 Appendix, 55 References. The manifestation of populism in the political, economic, & ideological spheres of Latin American societies is discussed, & propositions specifying the structural basis of populist political-economic processes are posited. It is shown that political mobilization of the new urban masses, in concert with the development of social welfare & state-supported unionism, are responsible for the enlarged relative autonomy of the Latin American state vis-à-vis the industrialists who benefit from populist economic policies. Changes in the international political & economic climate & contradictions inherent in populism incline populist movements toward instability & ultimate dissolution, & to the establishment of a right-wing regime. 61 References. An analysis of the relationship between progress & leisure in the context of culture. It is often purported that there is almost a correspondence between technological progress & benefits to the world of leisure, either in time-saving or increases in available diversions & services; burgeoning leisure itself is even proposed as a reliable measure of cultural progress. Here, it is alternatively suggested that the effect of technological progress on leisure is negligible at best, & destructive at the worst. The works of three mid-twentieth-century thinkers on questions of human meaning–Edward Sapir, Friedrich Juenger, & Karl Jaspers–are reviewed to explore their views on the nature of culture, progress within culture, & the connections between leisure & culture. On the basis of these interpretations, it is concluded that: (1) cultural perpetuation has little to do with technological progress; (2) we actually may work more today than ever before; & (3) whatever free time we earn is usually fettered & segmented, & hence unfree, unharmonious, & hardly a significant culture-bearing experience. 15 References. Here, it it demonstrated that the pyramid integrates into the harmonious urban axis of Paris & signifies a continuity between the ancient & the modern city. Also, by directing incoming visitors to the three principal sections of the museum, the pyramid accentuates the historical dimension of the museum, thus introducing novel museographical concepts, so far obscured by the debates. 5 References. ¶ Considered are situations in which imagery & symbolic practices exist that bring to light our relations with people having supposedly different natural & cultural characteristics. Images & practices of this type–all stemming from self-styling ourselves as "white" & "Western"–are present in widely diverse contexts of our symbolic imagery, & their obviousness makes them difficult to trace. Examples offered from Italian popular culture, including: travel agency brochures; satirical cartoons about cannibals; TV advertisements for chocolates, licorice, & coffee; certain items in weekly puzzle magazines; exotic games in amusement parks & shooting at fairground models in shape of an exotic antagonist; racist slogans at football matches; & the "hunt the Moroccan" campaign carried out with considerable violence in Florence the night of Shrove Thursday, 1990, by a band of disguised & masked youths. An analysis of the constructive logic of such symbolic discourses & practices reveals that values (positive/negative) of different exotic scenarios & roles (servant/antagonist) of exotic performers vary according to different contexts (eg, publicity or joke). 22 References. Art, Literature and Culture, Cultural Studies, 1992, 6, 2, May, 248-260.

¶ One aspect of postmodern art–the supposed blurring of the boundaries between the fine arts & mass culture–is examined via a reading of Pierre Bourdieu & an analysis of recent developments within one "low-literary" genre, the detective story. The claim by several postmodernists that the emergence of different forms of postmodernism (eg, cinema, jazz, photography) in the arts indicates the breakthrough of cultural postmodernity is assessed, as is Frederic Jameson's assertion that postmodernity constitutes the third great expansion of capitalism around the globe. A Bourdieusian view of contemporary culture in the West is developed along with an outline of a sociological approach to postmodernism in the arts. Following modifications to Bourdieu's theory of cultural reproduction & legitimation, it is concluded that, within contemporary Western culture, the relationship between legitimating bodies (ie, the education system & its surrounding cultural field) has undergone a radical transformation synonymous with an increasing horizontalization of culture & the blurring of distinctions between high & low art. 22 References. ¶ In a reconsideration of Walter Benjamin's work, in light of recent developments in cultural studies, an attempt is made to account for his marginalization by the cultural Left in GB in the 1980s. Benjamin's ideas on mass & popular culture are explored via readings of Susan Buck Morss's The Dialectics of Seeing: Walter Benjamin and the Arcades Project, (Cambridge, Mass: MIT Press, 1989) & a collection of Benjamin's essays & fragments contained in Gesammelte Schriften (Tiedemann, R. ¶ Marketing strategies of Toys R US–a nation-wide chain store that sells mass-marketed goods–are compared to those of upscale stores whose target population is affluent, educated, middle-class (Mc) parents. Assuming that class differences are evident in the kinds of toys parents purchase, it is shown that Toys R Us's physical layout stages a negotiation between parents & children about social aspirations, values, & the practices of consumerism. Upscale toy stores, which tap Mc anxiety over proper child development, tend to offer finely crafted goods made of natural materials that often imply images of European culture. Goods in these stores also tend to be educational. The implications of these two different toy markets for educational attainment are discussed, showing that the promotional, mass-marketed toys sold to predominantly working-class children are most likely to be rejected as decadent by Mc parents. 25 References. The Viennese soccer culture between WWI & WWII, typified by Bohemian elements & commitments to a particular club in a given locality, gave way to a modern, internationalized media-dominated image of the game during the 1960s. ¶ To investigate factors influencing physical activity among late-middle-aged & elderly adults, questionnaire data were obtained from 1,000 respondents age 50+ (average age, 64.9) throughout Austria. The frequency of such activities as bicycling, swimming, gymnastics, strolling, hiking, & other leisure activities was measured in connection with health & social integration. Analysis reveals that social status, gender, & education are the most important factors influencing exercise patterns. However, the role of expectations is also very important. Instead of trying to understand the interplay of meanings attached to exercise, it is more fruitful to concentrate on the whole configuration of intentions than on any single motivational factor. Additionally, the subjective meanings of exercise as communication & acknowledgement reveal how personal meanings are constructed for different levels of activity. 2 Tables, 5 Graphs, 24 References. ¶ A content analysis of Women's Sports & Fitness magazine, 1965-1989. Author, article length, gender, sport, race, & sporting role were assessed for each of the 301 feature articles; the number of accompanying pictures & the characteristics of those featured in the articles were also tallied. Gender, race, sport, & active or posed status of the individual appearing on the cover were coded. Whites were featured in 92% of the articles, mostly in tennis, running, track, basketball, & golf. Of the 151 covers, 98.7% showed females with 92% whites & 8% blacks. It is observed that this magazine, on its covers & in its feature articles, changed its emphasis from reporting on traditional sports & competitions to focusing on fitness activities that appeal to all women. 1 Table, 8 References. Messner, Michael A. (U Southern California, Los Angeles 90089), When Bodies Are Weapons, Peace Review, 1992, 4, 3, fall, 28-31.

¶ The use of violence against others in sports appears to be a learned behavior that conveys contradictory social meanings. Participants in violent sports view their aggression as a natural manifestation of their God-given talents & physiological make-up, but at the same time, acknowledge the hours & years of training spent in developing their talents & bodies. The virile, muscular male (M) body also conveys messages of force & power, including the "natural" power of men over women. Violence in sports, even that resulting in serious injury, is viewed from a contextual morality which suggests that participants, as long as they follow the rules, are free from making moral choices. In fact, their aggression is viewed as being worthy of respect. Participants in violent sports are viewed as tough guys, willing to play when hurt, modern day gladiators at the top of the pecking order of M dominance. D. ¶ A discussion of the seeming contradictions between knowled levels of mental cognition & body coordination. Teachers, co sports enthusiasts realize that it is almost impossible to speak of periences, since language is devoid of adequate expressions to describe them. Similarly, athletes have only an imperfect understanding of oral or written instructions, leading to a performance different from that expected by the coach. It is precisely these elements, not conveyed by linguistic means, that form a key part of the locomotor skills to be learned in imagining, realizing, & correcting movements. Such skills may be referred to as implicit knowledge, considered in the athlete's personal experience to be the "right" feeling, intuition, or understanding. Examples are presented of how such knowledge can be used in practicing sports. 26 References. Adapted from the source document.

The Diverging Popularity of Soccer and Cricket in the Netherlands, 1870-1930), Amsterdams Sociologisch Tijdschrift, 1992, 19, 2, Oct, 3-35. (DUT)

¶ In the late 1800s, soccer & cricket were both limited in their popularity in the Netherlands, being played by the sons of the wealthy in the more modern cities. There were even several clubs whose members practiced both sports. However, soccer expanded in popularity during the twentieth century, while cricket remained as an elite sport. Historical analysis shows that, even in the 1800s, cricket players tended to be aristocrats & were usually older than soccer players. Cricket, with the highly institutionalized English traditions, conventions, symbols, rules, equipment, & behavior, offered the upper class (Uc) a vehicle to distinguish themselves from the lower class (Lc). In contrast, soccer was a commercialized sport in England, where it was already popular with the Lc by the time it was introduced to the Netherlands in the 1880s. By the 1920s, there were many more Lc soccer clubs than Uc ones, leading to a revival of cricket among members of the Uc who sought a sport symbolic of their high socioeconomic status. 6 Photographs, 35 References. ¶ In an examination of the apparent underrepresentation of French Canadians in the National Hockey League (NHL), Marc Lavoie's, Gilles Grenier's, & Serge Coulombe's explanation focusing on the costs of bilingualism & anti-French Canadian discrimination (see SA 36:5/88T9780) is evaluated & found wanting. It is demonstrated that French Canadian underrepresentation, particularly at the forward & defenseman positions, is a systematic occurrence explainable by the application of defensive skill & player size selection criteria. These criteria result in a disproportionate limitation on the selection of athletes from the predominantly French Canadian Quebec Major Junior Hockey League. In Performance Differentials in the National Hockey League: Discrimination versus Style-of-Play Thesis, Lavoie (U of Ottawa, Ontario), Grenier, & Coulombe challenge Walsh's contention that anti-French Canadian sentiments & nepotism play no role in Francophone underrepresentation in the NHL, & demonstrate that the overall performance of French Canadians in the NHL is superior to that of Anglophones–a finding that contradicts the conclusions of Walsh's analysis, particularly his contention that French Canadians suffer discrimination as a result of size rather than ethnicity. 4 Tables, 17 References. Here, theoretical & comparative case analysis reveals a substantial difference between the efficacy of traditional diplomatic negotiation & tacit measures, eg, the deployment &/or exercise of military forces near the scene of crisis as communication modes Where negotiation alone often fails, backing, preceding, or, at times, replacing diplomacy with tacit measures afford the greatest chances for success. ¶ The future of the postcommunist states in Eastern Europe depends largely on the chosen constitutional framework. ¶ Since the 1940s, the industrialized Western nations have increasingly become welfare states. However, nationalized social care is exclusively reserved for each country's own citizens. The white people of these nations, with their wealth & government security nets, see little need to extend their system to the impoverished nations of other races. In an exploration of the conditions that would favor the development of universal welfare, it is argued that any transnational policy should be oriented toward alleviating the poverty of the poorest nations by stimulating local industries. Once local earnings are spent in local markets instead of being transferred to the metropolis, there will be a positive effect on the local labor market, increasing the chances for the young to grow up in a healthy environment. However, contemporary power relations will not permit quick changes benefiting the developing countries. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The Gulf war is examined in its global context, emphasizing political & economic motives & consequences. The most immediate reasons for going to war stemmed from the West's reliance on oil & the US domestic recession, which had spread to most of the world by the late 1980s. Although Saddam Hussein's aggressive posture was real enough, he "walked into a trap," because the US & the West were already poised for war. The considerable human & military costs of the war may never accurately be known, from the unfathomable number of Iraqis killed & injured & the severe crises faced by refugees to the global & regional effects of smoke & spilled oil. Moreover, the costs of the war were also political–the violation of democracy at home & the forfeit of peace abroad–& these are issues that the global community must begin to address. The relative positioning of the US, Europe, Japan, the Confederation of Independent States, & the Third World in the new world order are also considered. M. ¶ An Afrocentric geopolitical linkage analysis of the struggle between Eurocentrism & Afrocentrism. Since the fifteenth century, ethnocentrism, etnocentrism, & xenophobia have characterized, fashioned, & conditioned the European attitude or mind-set toward African peoples. Eurocentrism pontificates that Africans must always judge themselves using the European as their standard, model, or norm. Eurocentrism seeks to perpetuate the myth of European supremacy, invincibility, & originality coterminous with the myth of African inferiority & nothingness. Multiculturalism is indeed a stepping stone to Afrocentrism because of the historical truism that the African culture is the original culture from which all other cultures are derived. Afrocentrism posits the human being as the centrality/totalness of all existence as opposed to Eurocentrism, which posits political power & cross materialism as the centrality of all existence. Afrocentrism represents the most potent challenge to the European global power structure in the past century. 23 References. ¶ Because the Gulf war represents the "first significant manifestation of Washington's (DC) bid for unchallenged world hegemony," questions are raised about the future of the US-led new world order, from its novelty & orderliness to its long-term potential. To assess postwar regional prospects for governments & people, four scenarios are developed: new & stable order, new order but chaos, old order & relative stability, & old order but chaos. The likely outcome probably depends on one's perspective; how a neorealist approach might differ from a sociological, internalist, approach is assessed. Based on the latter, it is determined that the fourth outcome is most likely–little change in order but heightened instability. 1 Table. M. ¶ In delineating an analytical method that allowed the theoretical space for exploring the ontological contradictions endemic to living as part of a national community, it became obvious that it is necessary to work comparatively across history & across different social forms. To do so, a method is needed that conceives of the various kinds of human community as formed in the changing & contradictory intersections of (diacritically distinguishable) levels of integration–from the most embodied ties of face-to-face reciprocity to the most abstract relations of strangers-in-association, as exemplified by the electronic communications of "information capitalism." An attempt is made to determine whether US policy toward Latin America in the 1980s contributed to the resurgence of democracy in the region. ¶ Eleven governments have murdered in cold blood some 143 million people in this century. The bloodiest of these governments were those of the USSR (about 62 million victims), the People's Republic of China (35 million) & Nazi Germany (21 million). This killing manifests the principle that power kills, absolute power kills absolutely. This principle applies not only to genocide & mass murder, but also to war & other forms of collective violence. The more power a government has, the more it can act arbitrarily according to the whims & desires of the elite, & the more likely it will make war on others & murder its foreign & domestic subjects. Indeed, the empirical & theoretical conclusion is that the way to end war & virtually eliminate the conditions for genocide & mass murder appears to be through restricting & checking power. ¶ On the eve of the 1997 transfer of sovereignty from GB to the People's Republic of China, Hong Kong is suffering from the dearth & ineffectiveness of political leaders. The factors contributing to this dilemma are the: (1) nature of colonial governance, (2) character of the Chinese community, (3) institutional features of the local social-political system, (4) conflicting & discontinuous leadership policies of the Chinese & British governments, & (5) erratic & elusive popular support for the leaders. The major overall effects of these factors are: (A) multiple channels of leader recruitment, (B) inadequacy of these channels for the cultivation of strong leaders, (C) division & instability of political leadership, (D) dependence of leaders on political patronage from above, & (E) individualized leadership behavior. ¶ As European unification gained momentum in the 1980s & early 1990s, a reinterpretation of integration emerged in terms of supranationalism or intergovernmentalism. It is argued that this integration process is described primarily by the crystallization of new models of decision making & weighing of interests as well as by forms of policy implementation both on the national & European Community levels. The integration process is a process of state formation, not in the transfer of authority to the supranational level, but rather, through the creation of a new, relatively open political system influencing & transforming the national political systems toward continuing modernization & flexibility of government function & policy. 26 References. ¶ Taking Zygmunt Bauman's book, Modernity and the Holocaust (Cambridge: Polity Press, 1989) as the point of departure, it is argued that the Holocaust highlights features intrinsic to modernity: put at great psychic distance as unknown, unseen, & faceless others, the Jews were killed according to the emotionally neutral stance of detachedness. The process by which the suspension of conditions of proximity between men may pave the way for large-scale immorality is discussed. Encountering distance, morality halts. To explain why, the significance of empathy in moral performance is emphasized. Morality requires emotional capacities no less than intellectual ones. Empathy is acquired & fostered within a small-scale setting; one becomes its subject through having experienced being its object. Immorality can be arrested only if the emotional & cognitive ballast developed in face-to-face interaction with close others is held on to as the moral point of view; the task is to extend the perspective of proximity to include prima facie distant & anonymous others as well as known ones. Such extension requires empathy & imagination. AA

The democratic ideology, however, is compatible with religion to the extent that it is lived as a private concern. However, the researcher in history cannot be aligned with ideological or philosophical stances, because of the nature of historical data. Historiography implies continual revision & reinterpretation of historical events. ¶ Speculation about the accuracy of reports from the White House medical & public relations staffs as to the degree of seriousness of a President's illness was renewed in the face of George Bush's May 1991 illness as the result of a hyperactive thyroid, later diagnosed as Graves' Disease. Much of this speculation recalled how the public had been deceived about the extent of President Woodrow Wilson's incapacitation in 1919 following a paralyzing stroke, & about the state of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's health as he campaigned for a fourth term. Press Secretary James Hagerty twice employed the tactic of swamping the press with medical bulletins & creating the appearance of a "working President" while Dwight D. Women in higher & lower service class & in blue-collar occupations, however, are more influenced by their own class than that of their partner's. ¶ A historical sketch of political parties in Belgium & the Netherlands shows that they are rather young phenomena with a short life during which they have undergone considerable change. After 1960, a thawing of the party system occurred in that the older, traditional parties declined while new parties kept appearing. The theory that the traditional parties would adapt by becoming catch-all parties is discussed. The rise of the new parties may be due to the challenges they pose when the traditional parties are engaged in a process of adaptation. This trend is more pronounced in Belgium than in the Netherlands. Key aspects of the parties include centralization, professionalization, membership, finance, & ideology. 4 Tables, 17 References. The results indicate that, while positional power exists in Poland, the mechanisms through which it works are different from those in either the US or Italy. Employees of vertically integrated & receiving industries are favored, particularly those from large, politically important enterprises with high levels of gender stratification. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 33 References. Translated from Russian by Mel Kattage.

¶ Reflections are offered on the meaning of such topics as the global expansion of Western values & technologies & the uncertain future of the Russian Republic, focusing on the issue of how it could best be governed. Against those who argue for democratization & free markets in the former USSR, it is contended that Western society itself suffers from deep contradictions & heterogeneities that threaten its admired stability. It is argued that the individualization of people's needs & interests has engendered a cultural crisis whose roots lie in the opposition between the increasingly spontaneous activity of the individual & the alienated forms of social life that dominate it as an external force. Other issues discussed include the crisis of electoral democracy, social contradictions of technology, & the necessity of flexible systems of production. W. ¶ In a comparison of the 1988 & 1992 US presidential campaigns, reflections are offered on the importance of symbolism & emotional appeals in deciding the outcomes. It is argued that voters are appropriately preoccupied with symbols & images, as well as with statistics; candidates do well to attend to both. It is concluded that: the ways in which issues & themes are constructed have themselves become issues, the reigning political vocabulary has reached the point of exhaustion, & separating real & symbolic issues is neither possible nor desirable. ¶ As the year 2000 approaches, most democratic governments lack leadership & goals & therefore suffer from disorientation. Although they are concerned with the material welfare of the masses, they ignore the spiritual life of the citizens. They also fail to consider the spirit of the laws, without which any constitution or legal system, however perfectionist, becomes nothing more than dead words. It is argued that the distinction needs to be maintained between reformism & utopianism. M. Meel (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ The US fascination with direct democracy has brought power to th people, but under conditions in which the people have little opportuni or incentive to think about the power they exercise. Primary fault found in the fact that the general public gets most of its political inform tion from the mass media, & lacks the motivation &/or social conditio necessary to facilitate intelligent debate & reflection on this materia The particular pitfalls of this type of "teledemocracy" are demonstrate via a case study of a public call-in program–America on tl Line–broadcast following the Presidential State-of-the-Union addres New innovations–apart from the polls, primaries, & referendums tha have brought a shallow form of mass democracy–are necessary if th people are to achieve a public voice for the expression of their will. ¶ An abbreviated political biography of David Duke, the ex-Ku Klux Klansman who polled nearly 44% of the vote in the 1990 US senate race in La, is offered to account for his astonishing political appeal, which is here conceived as postmodern fascism. Duke's early encounters with neo Nazi ideology & his founding of the National Assoc for the Advancement of White People are discussed. It is argued that Duke's likable personality, handsomeness, & felicitousness, along with his reappropriation & manipulation of civil rights rhetoric to serve his own ideological agenda, account for his relative political successes. It is further maintained that politicians who are repudiated by officials & other establishment figures tend to win the sympathy of La voters who prefer the "outsider" (eg, Huey "Kingfish" Long); Duke has positioned himself as one such outsider. Other contributing factors to Duke's rise include: La's depressed economy & Duke's ability to shed his past & persuade voters to focus on his current views & platform. Reflections on the prospect of attaining a multiracial & radically democratic workers' movement are offered. W. Howard (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ A review essay on books by: Giuseppe Di Palma, To Craft Democracies. An Essay on Democratic Transitions (Los Angeles: U of California Press, 1990); & Abraham F. Lowenthal (Ed), Exporting Democracy. The United States and Latin America, Vol. I: Themes and Issues; Vol. II: Case Studies (Baltimore, Md: Johns Hopkins U Press, 1991 [see listings in IRPS No. 68]). Di Palma's work is an example of a new optimistic perspective that sees democracy arising in a variety of social & economic contexts as a result of conscious actions by elites pursuing their own interests. Rather than emerging from given conditions, it is argued that democracy can be "crafted." To show that democracy is the result of deliberate choices, Di Palma disconnects regime transitions from existing institutional frameworks, from the economic & political basis of political alliances, & from the issues that orginally determined the existence of nondemocratic regimes. Lowenthal focuses on instances in which US officials have been explicitly interested in promoting democracy in Latin America. In contrast to Di Palma, Lowenthal concludes that democracy cannot be moved from one setting to another, but rather is rooted in a country's history, institutions, & values. While democracy has been promoted by old regime elite supporters, such promotion has often involved undemocratic means. The current period of democratic transitions presents a new factor, the end of the Cold war, which may promote stabilization in Latin American democracies. 10 References. S. Grant, Wyn (U Warwick, Coventry CV4 7AL England), Insider and Outsider Pressure Groups, Social Studies Review, 1990, 5, 3, Jan, 107-111.

¶ A distinction between insider & outsider pressure groups is unfolded into a typology of pressure groups using six categories: prisoner groups, high profile insiders, low profile insiders, potential insiders, outsider groups by necessity, & ideological outsider groups. Insider groups are able to exert a subtle influence on the formulation & implementation of public policy. Becoming & remaining an insider group constrains a pressure group's activities because such groups have to adhere to government-influenced informal rules. Environmental groups are examples of groups that have successfully made the transition from outsider to insider status. The usefulness of the insider/outsider distinction at the European Community (EC) level is considered, arguing that the EC offers multiple points of access to groups & a more open bureaucratic style, but the transfer of decision-making authority to the EC level is a slow & complex process. 6 References. ¶ The Left's failure to recognize the importance of Americans' mistrust of politicians is explored. Partly because of the influence of Marxist historical materialism, & the unconscious assumption in socialist groups that trust evolves naturally, the Left has remained unconcerned with a conceptualization of trust. Since WWII, candidates have been transformed into "character-peddling" entrepreneurs, independent sometimes even of a party affiliation. After noting the enormous influence of TV on the public's impression of a candidate, it is suggested that social & cultural conditions undermine the public's confidence. J. Anderson, the former editor of New Left Review (NLR), has reprinted his 1987 "Figures of Descent" with some of his earlier NLR essays in English Questions. Anderson's view of history has changed in the last decade to one in which national fortunes are formed by variable national endowments, sociocultural structures, & political institutions. Within this view, he is not hopeful for the future of socialism: capitalism will not disappear before or with socialism, but will survive it. Anderson concedes that even the most successful European social democracies have had to modify their power, but still puts a good deal of hope in the British Labour Party. In contrast to Anderson, it is argued that England's current political state cannot be taken as the starting point for political reform; state & identity need to be separated to effectively survive in the new international economy. ¶ The development of the idea of democracy is traced from city-states of antiquity & the early republican tradition to liberalism & Marxism, & the relevance of the primary conceptions of democracy to contemporary circumstances is explored. In light of the complex interconnections among states & societies, a new agenda for democratic theory is offered that departs from an exclusive focus on particular political communities & the nation-state. After examining various key models of the international order–eg, the states system, the UN Charter framework–a case is made for a cosmopolitan international democracy. Despite many difficulties, strong grounds are presented for this model's indispensability to the maintenance & development of democracy both within & across preestablished borders. 3 Tables, 1 Appendix. ¶ Policies concerning the indigenous populations of Mexico were first implemented during the presidency of Lazaro Cardenas, & called for integrating the indigenous groups on social, cultural, & economic levels. This earlier policy, in an assimilative vein, purported to integrate the fifty-six different ethnic groups within the dominant cultural & linguistic (Spanish) group. The current policy, "bilingual-bicultural indigenous education," purports to teach the scientific contents of Western education, but also salvage the ethnic contents of the indigenous population. This policy necessarily calls into question the earlier attempt at assimilation. However, to arrive at true biculturalism, not only the curriculum but also the didactics using the practical tools & sociohistorical consciousness of the West implies resistance to nativism. The connections between language & thought & problems in the construction of knowledge need to be recognized in the teaching-learning process with different cultural groups. 12 References. Popular & oppositional internal & external movements that challenge the Islamic authenticity of these regimes are discussed. It is argued that these three interpretations of Islam aticulate the ideologies of those in power, eg, conservative, reformist, & revolutionary, as well as each society's historical legacy, characteristics, & immediate setting. The most effective challenges of Islamic legitimacy were manifested in Pakistan & Sudan, due to the multiethnicity of these countries, the military regimes' lack of political capital, & lack of charismatic leadership. ¶ Against Francis Fukuyama's claims regarding the "end of history" (nc reference provided), it is argued that liberalism's fragility is exposed now more than ever, & that intractable social problems--eg, drugs, crime, inequality, & political malaise--signal its dissolution. The acceleration of deculturation, coupled with a media-fed ethos of cynicism & hedonism, ensure liberalism's decline & the further degradation of our political traditions. It is suggested that the growing importance of environmental issues signifies our entrance into a new age of limits to economic development & human control over nature & society. Several of liberalism's founding premises are scrutinized, including its commitment to progress & its faith that a liberal state can dispense with civic virtue. Los Angeles, Calif, is shown to embody the "triumph" of liberalism, both in its counterurbanization & its antisocial organization. It is concluded that a more egalitarian populism might be capable of generating real political & social change, & the current liberal ideology of multiculturalism will lead only to the creation of new bureaucracies & the further rationalization of existing ones. The fourth was the Boris Yeltsin decree expelling from the workplace the party committees that were the traditional basis for the Soviet leadership recruitment (in July 1991). ¶ The impact of Communist party affiliation on social mobility was investigated in interviews conducted 1984/85 with 3,567 Croatians in socialist Yugoslavia in 9 occupational groupings, dealing with their political party membership & the membership of their parents, & their parents' involvement in the partisan, antifascist movement during WWII. Loglinear analysis showed that party members themselves were twice as likely as nonparty members to be upwardly mobile, even with the population as a whole upwardly mobile. Party members were more likely to be in managerial/professional & office positions than were nonparty members. There were no significant effects in educational attainment or mobility as a result of the individual's parents being party members or partisans, but party or partisan membership for the parents tended to increase occupational fluidity. Parental occupational position was a much more important variable in determining occupational position than was parental political affiliation. The youngest age cohort was the least likely to advance through intergenerational occupational association, while the middle cohort was the most likely. 5 Tables, 1 Appendix, 54 References. ¶ The situation of intellectuals in Poland is explored via an analysis of the political marginalization of Adam Michnik, a polish intellectual & political activist who, along with Lec Walesa, provided leadership for political & social reform in the 1970s & 1980s. During this time, Michnik symbolized the ideals of struggling against oppression & of creating a new political form based on an organic alliance between intellectuals & workers. Michnik's effectiveness in speaking on society's behalf diminished, however, when the postcommunist Polish government allowed civil society to dissolve into a corporate struggle of opposed interests. It is argued that Michnik & other intellectuals' recycling of the nineteenth-century concept of civil society offered him a last hope to assume the Enlightenment role of agent of universal values. Michnik's moral agenda & strategy of antipolitics are examined, & the general predicament of intellectuals, in both East & West, is discussed. W. ¶ Three arguments that account for the growth of democracy over the past two centuries are presented: (1) democracy is a naturally occurring phenomenon, & elections are not necessary for it to take root; (2) democracy has proliferated because it relies on & celebrates political inequality rather than equality; & (3) democracy's greatest asset is that it requires little of people & can function quite well with the minimal human being. A conclusion contrasts democracy with competing paradigms. In Wo(e)begon(e) Democracy, Michael Lienesch (U of North Carolina, Chapel Hill) praises Mueller on stylistic grounds, but criticizes him for eliding relevant academic debates & for accepting as self-evident the assumptions about democracy that have long been contested. Specifically, Lienesch takes Mueller to task for assuming inequality to be a universal, fundamental feature of all democracies. In Theory and Democracy, Mueller addresses each of Lienesch's criticisms, defends his assertion that inequality is a basic feature of democracy, & further argues that theorists of democracy have not understood their subjects' fundamental qualities. 36 References. ¶ Although of questionable utility in a country that is officially neutral, the Swiss Army continues to recruit all eligible male citizens. After tracing its historical origins, the symbolic & patriotic value of the army to the nation is noted. While the Swiss Army is Europe's largest & oldest, its only casualties are due to the flu. In the past, it was believed that the army was the best substantive guarantee of a national democratic tradition. Now, there are initiatives on the ballot to eliminate the army, & scandals have emerged involving the creation of a secret army. 2 Photographs. J. ¶ Italy represents an extreme case of the anamorphosis or deformation of the nation-state, exemplifying the difficulty of democratic rationalization of the political organization of contemporary society, which evolves, it is suggested, from the coexistence of state & its law & informal rules prevalent in society. Current characteristics of Italian society--eg, corruption, permanent political instability, & abused economy--are explained by the historical dichotomy of formal/informal rules, democracy/authoritarianism, & tolerance-intolerance. The origins of the anamorphosis are analyzed, reviewing the formation of the Italian nation, the instability of the political unification, the ascent of fascism, & the return of the republic. 108 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

Parekh, Bhikhu (U Hull, HU6 7RX England), The Cultural Particularity of Liberal Democracy, In Political Studies, 1992, 40, special issue, 160-175.

¶ After defining liberal democracy (LD) as liberalized democracy–ie, structured within the limits set by liberalism–the constitutive features of liberalism are outlined, showing how they determined the form & content of democracy & gave rise to LD as is known it today. It is then argued that LD is specific to a particular cultural context & cannot claim universal validity. This, however, does not lead to cultural relativism, since it is possible to formulate universal principles that every good government should respect. A way of reconciling universalism & cultural diversity is outlined. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

Griffin's book is praised for its attempt to define generic fascism as an ideal type in the Weberian sense, & for its categorization of several neofascist groups. Also exemplary is Brooker's analysis of the various mechanisms & organizations used to promote political & social solidarity among the Tripartite allies of WWII. Larsen's & Sandberg's bilingual (English/German) edition offers a general overview of the impact of fascism on European literature. Lewis offers a case study of Austrian labor problems under the First Republic, focusing on Heimwehr fascism. Peters, Helge, Gewalt in der Bundesrepublik (Violence in the Federal Republic of Germany), Soziologische Revue, 1993, 16, 1, Jan, 15-22. (GER)

¶ A review essay on a book edited by Hans-Dieter Schwind & Jürgen Baumann, Ursachen, Prävention und Kontrolle von Gewalt. Analysen und Vorschläge der Unabhängigen Regierungskommissionen zur Verhinderung und Bekämpfung von Gewalt ([Causes, Prevention and Control of Power. Analyses and Proposals of the Independent State Commission on Prevention of and Resistance to Power] Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1990 [see listing in IRPS No. 68]). About 100 experts, including psychologists, psychiatrists, sociologists, criminologists, & experts in police work & civil & criminal law, contributed to this four-volume work. A strong leftist orientation is noted, placing the blame for violence in the former West Germany on the system of economic production rather than analyzing violence as potentially defensive aggression by youth. Issue is taken with the claim that there would be no increase in politically motivated crime under a different system. Many critics argue that the report sought to justify the expansion of social control. Shortcomings can be seen in both the empirical basis of the report & its overall scheme. In many respects the report is disappointing, serving neither to eliminate nor reduce crime. 10 References. M. Meeks (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Major developments in human rights discussed at the forty-eighth session of the UN Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR), held in 1992, are examined. UNCHR concluded that the persistence of armed conflict & ethnic strife, as well as a continuing North-South political division, are both challenges to be faced. E. ¶ From the late 1970s throughout the 1980s, Israel's ultra-Orthodox Jews became more vocal in accusing Zionists of participating, even initiating, the Holocaust. Although shocking, the accusation gained acceptance with the growing number of Orthodox Jews drawn in by the community's charismatic leadership, & encouraged by increased representation in the Knesset. Arguing that Zionists had abandoned the Eastern European Hassidic Orthodox Jews before, many want to keep intact this memory in the construction of a new, post-Holocaust self-image. In the Orthodox Jews' struggle against a secular state established by Zionists their political interests to develop an alternative halachic state are furthered by these accusations. J. Intended primarily for labor movement activists, the analysis challenges the antisocialist claim that the humanistic ideals of freedom, social justice, & general welfare cannot be attained through public ownership. Several assertions by market reform advocates are critically assessed, & it is argued that the liberal-reformists, radical-democrats, & social reformists all propose models that are adapted from foreign experience. A platform for a peaceful popular revolution is proposed, focusing on three points: the concept of popular revolution, nonviolent political tactics, & consistent humanism. W. In an effort to curb the debt crisis, recession & unemployment, these partly successful strategies to suppress state intervention in the economy & to attract foreign investment are mere games in the repertoire of demogogic populist presidents. While fundamental economic restructuring is necessary, certain measures to produce it may prove unpopular. ¶ The notion that the youngest selections of the electorate are the most liberal & the eldest the most conservative is scrutinized, hypothesizing that the decline in popular support for the British Labour Party &

nticonsensus stance of the Conservative leadership since 1975 have promoted the erosion of the standard relationship between attitudes & age. The significance of interelection shifts in opinion is investigated by constructing a large data set containing all survey responses of each British Election Study 1964-1987. Focus is on the notion that the Margaret Thatcher years had remodeled attitude structures, particularly among the youngest sections of the electorate. Results indicate that younger voters who are currently being politically socialized are more open to influence than their seniors. When "political age" is looked at, some evidence that Thatcherism had an impact is found, especially on the 1979 & 1987 samples. In general terms, the conventional notion that young voters are more liberal than older voters is upheld, but investigation of separate electoral samples reveals substantial variations among young voters. 10 Tables. The Aug 1991 coup in the USSR was a revolution in two senses: as part of a larger series of events leading the disintegration of the USSR; & as a concentrated expression of Russia's revolutionary heritage. A number of interlocking models can be used to analyze the coup, drawing on primary documents, eye-witness accounts, & secondary sources. The heroic revolutionary approach examines the role of popular mobilization & suggests that those who argue that the coup was no more than an intraelite struggle underestimate the degree of popular mobilization. The conspiracy model examines the notion of a palace coup & concludes that there is no evidence for a conspiracy by any other group than the plotters themselves. The statist model notes that the Communist party was marginalized & even the plotters relied on the instruments of the state. The populist model notes the appeal to postcommunist forms of legitimation. The coup was not a reactionary but a conservative one, appealing to constitutionality while at the same time undermining it. The elite & class model notes the rise of second echelon elite structures who used the coup to come to power. The ontological block model suggests that the contradictions of perestroika reflected the larger crisis of the Soviet attempt to develop & sustain an alternative modernity that did not exist. The democratic revolution model, therefore, returns to approaches to modernization & political development. The coup & its consequences, therefore, represented a revolution to put an end to the whole revolutionary era of Russian history. ¶ An investigation of how political & economic competition affected county-level variation of black lynching rates in Ga in the 1890s. Specifically, it is argued that rates of racial violence rose when interracial competition increased, due primarily to black migration to southern manufacturing areas, black participation in the cotton economy, & the rise of black participation in the Populist movement. Forces leading to the Populist movement are examined, noting that black counties & counties with a higher degree of farm tenancy were more likely to have supported Populist candidates, while manufacturing counties were less likely to vote Populist. Findings also demonstrate that lynching rates increased when economic competition increased, but that counties that voted Populist did not have significantly higher rates of black lynching. 2 Tables, 59 References. ¶ Drawing on interview data from 104 members of the Texas House of Representatives, minority legislators' views on institutional rules & reforms designed to make institutions more democratic are examined, comparing the political behavior & views of blacks, Mexican Americans, & whites. Findings indicate that, even in a system that treats minorities fairly in terms of distributing influence positions, minority members are much more likely than influential members to favor institutional (committee) reform, which appears inconsistent with their satisfaction with the way the speaker & the system treat them. This inconsistency may be explained by considering why members get committee assignments; in the House's influence committees, accommodation appears to be the rule, since the only factor leading to assignments on influence committees is whether current members nominate them. Institutional structures should be further studied to more fully understand the legislative environment facing minority groups. 3 Tables. Adapted from the source document. It is suggested that his ambivalence stems from their own ambivalence toward the hard choices about family & work they have had to make since feminism became fashionable; since Clinton has had to make the same hard choices, their mixed feelings are being projected on Clinton during the preelection period. ¶ An argument is proferred in favor of representative government in the US. Overreliance on constitutional initiatives (most notably in Calif), combined with citizen approval of legislative term limits, shows that "we the people" have lost our political moorings. Democracy depends on our exercising the intelligence with which we were endowed; no form of government is tamper-proof against the actions of its own citizens. Turned on its head, direct democracy is no longer democratic. The constant denigration of politics explains why we get one candidate (Jerry Brown) who treats politics as corruption & another (H. Ross Perot) who promises to save us from politics itself. The problem is not with democratic politics, but with our willingness to accept its conflicts & compromises. To better understand the effectiveness of European social security systems, a statistical analysis is presented of the impact of social security in erms of income redistribution & minimum wage policies in Belgium, Catalonia (Spain), Greece, Ireland, Lorraine (France), Luxembourg, & he Netherlands. The effectiveness of social security is greater n the wealthier Benelux countries, where outlays are accordingly greatr. An attempt is made to replicate Yeheskel Hasenfeld's & Jane A. Rafferty's "The Determinants of Public Attitudes toward the Welfare State" using LISREL software (see SA 37:5/89U9783) & structural quation techniques. After presenting the standardized parameters in a ath model predicting overall welfare support, the LISREL model with ronbach alpha & endogenous latent variables is used, incorporating estimates of measurement errors. A failure to match Hasenfeld's & Rafferty's conclusions indicates improper operationalization of crucial conepts in their model, & imprecise measurement of three key outcome ariables. More rigorous testing would rectify these problems, allowing accurate assessment of the public attitudes/welfare state relationship. A Response to Emerson and Van Buren, Rafferty (U of Michigan, Ann rbor) & Hasenfeld reply that although their own model did not account r measurement error, Emerson's & Van Buren's alternative does not easure overall goodness of fit of the models. A historical analysis is presented contrasting the development of the lfare state in Belgium & the Netherlands over the past century. In th cases, corporative structures dominate over liberal & etatist models, monstrated by the frequency of social organizations directing & carry- out caring activities. Such corporativism goes back to the extensive works of organizations formed along religious & ideological divisions.

After 1960, differences between the two countries began to emerge in terms of the organization of welfare activities. In the Netherlands, there is fear of increasing statization & commercialization. ¶ An examination of the likely consequences of putting a two-year time limit on Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC). Although it is argued that most single mothers already leave AFDC if they can earn appreciably more by working, their current income includes unreported earnings & family contributions that might disappear if they took a regular job. It is further argued that, even after excluding medical care, single mothers currently consume goods & services whose value is slightly greater than the federal poverty threshold, & that any alternative to AFDC must provide at least that level of consumption if mothers are to keep their families together. Given likely wage levels, the government will have to provide about $5,000 worth of supplementary assistance to single mothers working in minimal wage jobs. This can come through a more generous earned income tax credit, housing & child care subsidies, a universal food stamp program, or other means. 1 Table, 1 Graph. ¶ To maintain social integration, democratic governments are faced with dilemmas in balancing civil & social rights as routes to welfare, especially in old age. Here, an examination of British debates on citizenship, using the work of T. H. Marshall (Citizenship and Social Class, Cambridge: Cambridge U Press, 1950), focuses on relationships between citizenship & the welfare of elderly people in GB. An exploration of Marshall's three elements of citizenship–civil, social, & political rights–is used to argue that he confuses "rights" & "opportunities" in his notion of civil rights. This critique is then developed in terms of R. Titmuss's concept of the social division of welfare ("The Social Division of Welfare," in Essays on the Welfare State, Allen & Unwin: London, 1958) to distinguish different routes to welfare in old age. A distinction is made between a civil opportunity route to occupational pensions & a social rights route to a state earnings-related pension. Social class & gender dimensions of citizenship & inequality in old age are delineated. 1 Table, 22 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The proposed consumer choice or voucher system of elderly care proposed in Sweden is based on high-sounding popular principles of market dynamics & individualistic social service; however, in practice, market & individualistic principles do not necessarily lead to enhanced service or quality of life, nor do they reflect the collective interests of the elderly or of society. Care of the elderly is not a commodity service, but a collaborative system facilitating interaction between the elderly, health personnel, & the family, & between health services & home health care. New & flexible delivery systems that reflect the needs & preferences of the elderly are needed. Devji, Faisal Fatehali (Dept History U Chicago, IL 60637), Hindu/Muslim/Indian, Public Culture, 1992, 5, 1, fall, 1-18.

¶ Explored is the extent to which postcolonial Indian nationalism has been constructed as a problematic with respect to the communal figure of the Muslim. It is argued that Hindu nationalism cannot be analyzed either ontologically or in terms of excluded differences because ontological readings of nation fail to account for difference, & deconstructive readings fail to attend to the margin's silences & contradictions. As such, histories of both Indian nationalism & its "other" fail in the end to engage with the historical complexity of Hindu/Muslim/Indian relations, while a history of the difference that nationalism both created & excludes, & that makes nationalism possible in the first place, must be attempted. Issues addressed include: why Hindu nationalism has arisen, violence provides the greatest mode of expression, Muslims are attacked, & women provide the most complex images of the Muslim; how Muslims have responded; & what the implications of partition are. ¶ A survey of Slovak public opinion was conducted monthly from Apr 1990 to July 1991 (N not given). Of the 23 issues investigated, social & economic questions were generally judged to be the most important. During late 1990, ecological issues were also in the forefront. Later, the nationality problem & language issues gained prominence, as friction arose with both Czechs & Hungarians living in Czechoslovakia. Ethnic tensions were substantially higher in Bratislava than in the eastern districts. The influence of various political parties in arousing & soothing nationalist tensions is discussed. 2 Graphs, 9 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A discussion of how nation building & interpretation of history have been linked in three phases of the historical development of Rhodesia & Zimbabwe. The historical mythologies that were established by colonial society to justify European conquest in 1890 & the subsequent suppression of the Ndebele & Shona revolts of 1896/97 & later. African resistance to colonization, & land alienation are described. Central to this mythological effort, which manifested itself in varieties of archaeological, anthropological, & historical writing as well as in literary & pictorial creations, was the representation of the precolonial past as an ahistoric state of primitivity, whose only experience of change was conflict over boundaries between groups of fixed "tribal" identities. Vestiges of history, eg, the Zimbabwe ruins, were interpreted as the non-African remnants of earlier "Phoenician" or "Sabaean" settlement that had eventually succumbed to the pressures of barbarism. The African nationalist writing of history that emerged in the 1960s is described; it partly tried to reconstruct the development of precolonial modes of production & forms of government, & partly painted modern African history as a heroic tradition of resistance to white rule. New types of official history writing appearing since Zimbabwe's independence in 1980 are considered. In some respects, this writing replicates the mythological aspects of colonial historiography, situating the roots of modern national identity in an idealized autonomous African past & creating its own symbolism around such monuments as the Zimbabwe ruins. Examples are presented of new forms of postcolonial history writing that challenge the ideological orientations of both colonial & African nationalist interpretation, & it is shown how the past remains a battlefield for conflicting ideas about what development & progress may imply. 46 References. ¶ At present, Slovakia does not have a Jewish nationality problem, because most Jews were killed during WWII & the survivors chose to emigrate. At the time of emancipation in 1867, most of the 240,000 Jews in the Hungarian Empire, of which Slovakia was a part, were linked primarily with Hungarian culture, but in the Turiec region, with the Slovaks. After the creation of an independent Czechoslovakia in 1918, the strong cultural affiliation of the Jews with the Hungarians led to some problems. After WWI, there were about 144,000 Jews in Slovakia. Several waves of deportations to the death camps during WWII reduced the Jewish population to several thousand by 1945. The remainder then joined with the Slovaks or the Hungarian minority in the South. Currently, the term Jew designates religious creed, not ethnicity. 8 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The term "nationalism" has a negative connotation in Slovakia as opposed to Western Europe, implying a style of political thought dominated by the interests of one national group over all other values. Such nationalism or jingoism, often disguised as internationalism or etatism, has played a very negative role in twentieth-century history, often manifested in ambition to rule others & intolerance of others. This type of negative nationalism did not appear in Slovakia until the 1930s, with the advent of Hlinka's Slovak National party. The current movement toward Slovak sovereignty is distinguished from this negative type of nationalism. 4 References. Adapted from the source document. Respondents were asked to explain 12 common political terms in their own words & to complete 10 self-identifying sentences. Special attention is given to differences in the way the word "national" is understood by Czechs & Slovaks. It is no wonder that politicians have such difficulty in formulating policy if they assume that the same words mean the same thing to all people. ¶ Reflections are offered on the declining importance of nation-states, focusing on the historical development & decline of the British empire. It is argued that nations articulate not only the cultures of the world system, but also the uneven development of the cultural formation of modernity. It is further contended that GB is currently in the throes of a deep crisis that turns on four developments--racism, reactionary modernism, nationalist pressures from the subordinate nations of the UK, & increasing involvement with federal Europe--which threaten to dismantle the unity of the British state. It is concluded that nation-states are in fact losing their power as organizers of culture. 4 References. W. Howard (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Social change in the Arab/Islamic world & the responses of secular Arab intellectuals to it are examined. It is maintained that, over the last century, the patriarchal structures of Arab society, rather than having been modernized, have merely been refashioned & preserved in modernized forms. Facilitated by European imperialism, this path of Arab development has resulted in a schism among Arab intellectuals. The impact of postmodern theory on secular Arab intellectuals is also discussed. In Nationalism, Islamic Revival and the Need for a New Political Discourse in the Middle East: Response to Hisham Sharabi, Mansoor Ehsan argues that Sharabi's call for autonomous, indigenous thought among Arab intellectuals plays into the hands of the Islamist. Ehsan goes on to note that both nationalism & Islamism are essentialist discourses, & that the Arab/Muslim world will progress only when class inequality & gender oppression are discussed candidly & critically. In Reply to Mansoor Ehsan, Sharabi argues that Ehsan misconstrues his comments on the role of cultural criticism in effecting modernity in the Arab world. W. Sociological research into class structure becomes theoretically & methodologically problematic when gender is an operative variable. Functionalists analyze class through a number of variables, including social dominance, with differing conceptions as to the unit of analysis (family or single individuals). While traditional analysis of the sexual division of labor categorizes the man as the economic head of household, single-working-woman families are now common. The joint classification & dominance methods for analyzing class structure are innovations in Italian research that incorporate both genders in the family. An illustration of these methods as well as a new use of path analysis is drawn from recent research. Such methods demonstrate patterns of class allocation found in the decision processes of social actors. 38 References. Adapted from the source document. Data from the 1973 Occupational Changes in a Generation Survey for 19,575 white & black employed males (Ms) indicate that family disruption during childhood substantially increases the odds of ending up in the lowest occupational stratum as opposed to the highest. Family disruption also weakens the association between dimensions of Ms' occupational origins & destinations. Ms from traditional 2-parent homes exhibit a stronger pattern of intergenerational occupational inheritance than do those from disrupted families; these effects are the same for blacks & whites. It is suggested that recent changes in family structure may lead to greater universalism in contemporary US society. 4 Tables, 52 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ A reexamination of income inequality models incorporating the simultaneous testing of multiple theories introduces & evaluates the explanatory value of an ecological-evolutionary model of income distribution. Here, an attempt to replicate results with the same data used in Miles Simpson's 1990 research (see SA 39:3/91X6757) suggesting that there is a curvilinear relationship between democratic rights & income inequality. The ecological-evolutionary theory proposes that national carrying capacities at a social & physical level (measured in terms of agricultural density in rural areas) impact modern social & economic histories. While Simpson may have overstated the class conflict perspective in interpreting data supporting his model, & prematurely rejected the "logic of industrialism" hypothesis (ie, national wealth varies curvilinearly with education & democracy), his central findings are validated here. In addition, it is noted that agricultural density contributes negatively to income inequality. 3 Tables, 69 References. Adapted from the source document. Here, analysis of data from the 1970 & 1980 Census for the Milwaukee (Wisc) metropolitan area demonstrates that class segregation among blacks is not new & did not increase sharply during the 1970s when ghetto conditions worsened. Poor black children did not uniformly experience dramatic declines in the availability of persons with Mc attributes. ¶ Individual-level data from 1973 & 1982 national household sample surveys were utilized in determining the relationship between education & income under different macroregional economic conditions in Brazil.

Ten operational variables were selected from 4 major theories on income differences (human capital, segmented labor market analysis, Marxian class analysis, & status analysis) for use in 24 path analyses, which also included gender, time (1973 & 1982), & 6 regional variables. Regression analysis showed that education had a powerful effect on income, even controlling for the major variables. The education effect was not linear, however; incremental income gains from a year of more advanced education were more than those from a year of less advanced education. About 50% of the total effect of education on income was mediated by the socioeconomic status of the individual's occupation. The educational effect applied to both genders, even though men earned more than women on the average. Regional development did not have a substantial effect on the relationship between education & income. 6 Tables, 2 Figures, 45 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ An attempt to establish a systematic connection between two areas of research that typically are treated separately in sociology research: (1) class structure & formation, & (2) ethnic-national identification & mobilization. An outline of the theory of Ludwig Gumplowicz is given, who maintained that ethnically homogeneous tribes were the basic dynamic of human history (see Der Rassenkampf [The Struggle of the Races], Innsbruck: Wagner, 1973 [1883]). Out of the struggles between them, classes & nations emerged that are endlessly fighting against each other for power. It is maintained that a true element in Gumplowicz's theory is the thesis that there exists a much closer relation between ethnic group formation & class stratification. Also, a new, strategic-structural perspective of social movements is presented. It stresses society-external forces & the autonomous determination & active role of the state in the rise of social movements. Concrete hypotheses are also developed about the interaction between the processes of class formation & ethnic-national mobilization in ethnically homogeneous, in pluriethnic, & in multinational societies. 1 Table, 75 References. Data from two surveys (by the author [N = 716 respondents], & a 1989 employment survey [N = 17,853]) indicate that two ways of modifying class structure from within–vertical intergenerational mobility, & present heterogamy–are interdependent: descending trajectories coincide with hypergamy; & ascending trajectories, with hypogamy. ¶ Data from 4 census reports are drawn on to describe the restructuring of spatial structures & social relations in the process of capitalist development in Korea & Taiwan, 1950s-1980s, focusing on the development of the new middle class (NMC). Analysis demonstrates that restructuring in these newly industrializing countries is closely related to the spatial division of labor in advanced capitalist countries. Regional & social class problems in Korea & Taiwan are discussed, showing how the proportion of the NMC located in the most industrialized areas has been higher than that in the rest of country. In addition, the importance of the regions that exercise external control of the production process (the capital cities) has been increasing in proportion to that of the regions in which production processes are located. Considering the functions of the NMC in relation to capital accumulation (supervision, reproduction, value realization, & technological innovation), spatial trichotomization is revealed in Korea & spatial dichotomization in Taiwan. 8 Tables, 24 References. ¶ It is suggested that, in agrarian China, family division affected both mobility & distribution of landed wealth. The problems of convergence between classes, a regime of partibility & persistent land parcellization, & a partible inheritance offset by a lifetime of family labor are examined via analysis of interview data from a 1937 survey of heads of households (N not specified) in 3 north China plains villages conducted by the Japanese (Kito nōson jittai chōsa hōkoku sho [Field Study Report of Village Conditions in North China], Tianjin: South Manchurian Railway, 1937). It is noted that classes converged because of both demographic factors & a fragmented reproduction across social strata. The demographic factors caused more social mobility in large landholders. In the long term, however, smaller landholders were favored by the institution of partible inheritance & the gradually expanding market economy. 10 Tables, [illegible] References. J. ¶ In this continuation of an earlier article (see SA 41:2/93Z7790), cross-tabulation of data demonstrates the interdependence between the differentiation of the male population along multidimensional status-pattern clusters & six other variables. Analysis shows strong correlation between the official political activities in the former Czechoslovak communist regime & the 1991 social hierarchy. Eleven status-pattern clusters are established, based on attitudes toward continuing social change & toward the future in general; however, the multidimensional typological method of status differentiation shows ambiguity in the attitudes & political behavior among respondents in the same clusters. It is hoped that a large international study being prepared in 1993 will help clarify the situation. 3 Tables, 4 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Data from 9 national cross-sectional surveys conducted 1965-1990 are used to investigate changes in the influences of ascription & educational achievement on occupational attainment in Australia. A simple model of status attainment, constructed incorporating measures of both ascription & achievement processes, is analyzed separately for men & women. During the 1970s, the effects of father's occupational status declined & the effects of education increased quite dramatically. During the 1980s, the increase in the effects of education slowed. During the late 1960s & early 1970s, the influence of education on occupational attainment was smaller for women than for men. By the 1980s, men & women received similar returns from education. It is concluded that occupational attainment in Australia is now based more on achievement in the educational system than on ascriptive processes. 4 Tables, 2 Figures, 1 Appendix, 44 References. ¶ Explored is whether recent socioeconomic, cultural, & political transformations of modern democratic & industrialized countries have made the concept of social class irrelevant or whether it retains heuristic vitality & as sociological instrument. Moreover, the usefulness of social class in understanding social inequalities is called into question. After a instrumental definition is given of social class, classical lines of thought are contrasted with contemporary orientations. A rationale is provided for separating social inequalities from collective action at the conceptual level. A literature review examines various theories of social differentiation & stratification. Finally, the concept of social class & its position in the study of inequality are redefined in terms of power & authority. 87 References. M. ¶ A critical analysis of William Julius Wilson's classic work on urban poverty, The Truly Disadvantaged (Chicago, Ill: U Chicago Press, 1987), which analyzed the relationship between macroeconomic change (primarily deindustrialization) & inner-city underclass culture, relying exclusively on survey data. Wilson posited four major issues linking the domains of structure & culture: household formation & child-bearing behavior, social isolation, institutional disintegration, & aspirations of inner-city children. Wilson's arguments in these four domains are critiqued here, utilizing both classic & recent ethnographies of daily life in the African-American community. A research agenda for urban anthropology that will put the field back in the center of current policy debates on poverty is outlined. 33 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ An effort is made to determine if a new ethnic underclass is emerging in the Netherlands. Using a classification based on deprivation rather than behavior, an ethnic underclass is argued to exist when a group of people from a common ethnic & cultural background is excluded from the labor market, has little prospect of finding employment, & shows no sign of intra- or intergenerational upward mobility. Data from a 1988 survey of approximately 12,000 persons in 4,000 households in 10 major municipalities are used to describe the social positions of Turks, Moroccans, Surinamese, & Antilleans in relation to an indigenous Dutch control group. It is concluded that, though there is not an ethnic underclass in the Netherlands, Turks & Moroccans, in particular, are in danger of entering a vicious circle of marginalization. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 34 References. ¶ The issue of social equality in the period of transition from capitalism to socialism is examined via an analysis of the intraparty conflicts of the 1920s & 1930s in the USSR. Using documents of the Left opposition within the Soviet Communist party, the common view that Stalinism was both a leveling system & an ideology is challenged. Here, it is shown that, in an effort to justify social inequalities resultant from radical market reform, reform movement leaders contended that egalitarianism was a basic cause of the inefficiency of the administrative command system. It is concluded that popular resistance to the Left/liberal within the party project is best explained by the egalitarian values with which the Soviet people were inculcated. W. ¶ Adopting a purely sociological perspective in the analysis of justice-related phenomena, secondary sources & material from an international project on local justice, which investigated how intermediate institutions allocate scarce resources, are drawn on to explore the operative scope & legitimizing force that justice considerations have in various institutional contexts. It is shown that, contrary to what one might expect from a normative viewpoint, empirically, such considerations seem to be playing only a relatively minor role. Institutional conduct, even if relevant to justice, is usually not (primarily) guided by considerations of justice, & to the extent that it is, the latter tend to be conceptualized & operationalized in a way that makes them subordinate & conducive to the institutions' own ends & goals. The term "adaptive justice" aims to capture the semantic transformation that the notion of justice undergoes when employed in institutional contexts. ¶ Modern industrial society's relatively recent emphasis on female (F)

thinness is analyzed as a potentially adaptive response to two ecological developments: chronic food surplus, & the dismantling of barriers between males' & Fs' work. These developments, it is argued, have made thinness helpful to Fs competing for status & resources in both courtship & job markets. Various explanations for the Western ideal of thinness are critically assessed, & specific features of modern industrial life that link the emergence of the ideal of F thinness to behavioral patterns & mechanisms that evolved to aid ancestral humans in maximizing inclusive fitness are identified. The analysis also points up the utility of historical data in evolutionary analysis, & concludes that adaptive flexibility & cultural change are interrelated. 78 References. An attempt is made to determine the class position of this Asian entrepreneurial group, & to discern if movement into the petty bourgeoisie implies social mobility, or merely a sideways shift from the lumpen proletariat into the lumpen bourgeoisie. Analysis indicates that the market situation of these small business owners is quite secure, & that within the work situation, independence & a certain measure of control in interaction with the majority society are greatly valued. While status within the larger society may not be significantly improved, the host society standards are not that important for Asians–within their own communities, business entry & financial prosperity contribute to significant status enhancement. 9 Tables, 30 References. ¶ Social classification (eg, of religion & race) presents especially thorny problems for liberal states. Such categories, officially adopted or approved by the state & incorportated into law & administration, raise problems of political decision, including how states with different political systems shape the established categories & what rules they should follow. Understanding official social classification requires analysis of historical context, collective action, & political choice, which are delineated here. It is concluded that social classifications take on a life of their own, but their origins always lie in political choice. L. Dorn

The findings indicate that income mobility is decreasing; as a re sult, individuals have a lesser chance of improving their relative positio in the income distribution than they did twenty years ago. Akiyama, Kenji, Transliterated title not available (The Autonomy of Professional Associations–On Responses to Deviant Behavior by Members), Soshioroji, 1988, 32, 3, Jan, 81-97. (JPN)

¶ Professional autonomy consists of independence & self-control. Although professionals generally seek to control possible abuse of authority within their own group, laypersons are becoming vigilant about deviant professional behavior. Three case studies from Japan are presented: (1) a medical association handled a situation of inappropriate behavior by a physician largely within the confines of the professional organization, without involving clients; (2) a group of pharmacists resorted to administrative agencies & clients in dealing with a situation; & (3) a group of lawyers was highly influenced by clients, mass media, & administrative agencies. Professional associations, thus, are not always independent, but this does not mean that their autonomy is weak. Autonomy in performing one's professional work should be distinguished from autonomy of professional associations. 1 Figure. Adapted from the source document.

Information on recruitm policies was provided by the corporations' general counselor or recru ment officer. On the whole, women lawyers are less likely to be employ in manufacturing corporations. Increases in the proportion of females (Fs) in the legal profession have raised debate about the contribution of Fs to the organization & practice of law. Cultural feminists expect the presence of Fs will lead to a less adversarial, more caring form of lawyering, while radical theorists hold that the structure of law reproduces male (M) domination, & that F lawyers will produce little change. To examine these competing theories, interviews were conducted with 34 M & 34 F lawyers in 12 in-house legal departments in US business corporations. F lawyers were much more likely to work in medium-sized departments in financial servies, & Ms to work in manufacturing companies. Findings indicate that M & F lawyers do not share the same position in the legal labor pool; Ms have greater access to high-paying, prestigious jobs. It is concluded that gender segmentation is restricting the areas in which F lawyers might participate in transforming the legal culture. 2 Tables, 62 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Questionnaire data collected from 150 medical students at Makerere U (Kampala, Uganda) are used to test 4 hypothesis: (1) students' personal variables will significantly influence their level of acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS)-related stigma; (2) most respondents (Rs) will show evidence of risks of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) because of the nature of their profession; (3) most Rs will report behavioral changes aimed at minimizing contraction of HIV; & (4) the existence of AIDS will have affected the career objectives of most Rs. Results indicate that sex & year of study significantly influenced AIDS-related stigma, while age, religion, & tribe did not. Major risks identified include occupational hazards & prior sexual behavior, & major occupational hazards, needle pricks, contact with body fluids, & lack of protective equipment during medical procedures. Most Rs reported having already changed their sexual practices & behaviors. Contrary to expectations, most Rs wanted to remain in the medical profession, including working in specialties that involve interaction with AIDS patients. To investigate how this relationship affects professional ethics, questionnaire data were obtained from 314 engineers, 40 of whom were also interviewed. Analysis reveals a generation gap in terms of values. Younger engineers are much more cynical in assessing the merit of government-sponsored construction projects. ¶ Postsecondary job training leads to forms of identity, structuring an individual's professional socialization. Based on in-depth, nondirected interview data from 3 studies (S1, S2, & S3) conducted in the 1980s, a typology is constructed from classifications of work- attitude, career choices, & involvement in training. Academically poor-performing students (N = 45) in a socioprofessional training program were grouped according to immediate career life plans in S1. S2 looked at training of managers (N = 70) in 2 nuclear production facilities, with a focus on incentives for continued education & professional career paths, confirming the link between intense efforts at further learning & upward career mobility. Managers (N = 159) at 6 large private companies with innovative training programs, ranked by type of professional career path, job experience & attitude toward training, were examined in S3. From these, 4 separate professional identities emerged, as the subjective-biographical & the object-relational aspects of socialization were transacted: outsider, specialist, networking individualist, or internal business promoter. The professional socialization aspects embedded in this typology are discussed in light of functionalist & interactionist sociological theories. 2 Tables, 53 References. AA Tr & Modified by J. ¶ Demographic & questionnaire survey data from 255 managers of diverse companies in the UK & the Federal Republic of Germany are used to explore differential pressures on managers in European Community countries. Results show that Type-A behavior & high internal locus of control are common to both groups. German managers report feeling exposed to considerably more job-related pressure than did UK managers, & also demonstrated a higher likelihood of implementing an array of coping tactics, though UK respondents reported better coping with the home/work relationship. UK managers were more satisfied with the job itself & organizational processes but no significant differences emerged for other satisfaction subscales. The health outcomes were more positive for the Germans who, despite experiencing greater job stress, maintained superior mental health; no differences were reported in physical health. Overall, job pressure was associated with job dissatisfaction, low internal locus of control, & inferior psychological & physical health, while type-A behavior scores were negatively correlated with external locus of control & positively with job satisfaction. 3 Tables, 41 References. ¶ Network data collected in a medium-size US law firm are used to identify 2 informal mechanisms of integration by which a collegial organization protects itself against centrifugal forces. The first mechanism is described using a cohesion analysis that is based on the use of multiplex ties that cut across internal boundaries created by stratification, division of work, & a polycentric structure. The second is described via an analysis of structural equivalence in the coworker network, which is based on a particular form of interdependence among professionals who try to prevent each other from controlling big clients & manpower (teams of associates) at the same time. ¶ Characterizing the curriculum vitae (CV) as a confessional document, it is argued that this device encourages workers to take personal responsibility for the step leading from the surveillance, normalizing judgements, & examinations of the school to the new disciplinary & confessional regimes of the paid workplace. The CV also makes wage labor seem both "free" & destined. It is suggested that poststructuralist accounts of subjectivity are capable of lending new depth to traditional Marxist understandings of worker alienation & consciousness. 53 References. ¶ Questionnaire data from 1989 are drawn on to explore the career aspirations of 57[illegible] formers (final year of compulsory education) in 3 Rochdale (England) comprehensive schools. Analysis demonstrates that the relationships between various types of career aspiration & several explanatory variables (ethnicity, social class, gender, & school) are complex. Overall, it is concluded that there is little evidence of any important school effect, & that aspirations for higher education are determined both by ethnicity & social class among non-Asians. 1 Table, 3 Figures, 45 References. ¶ To test the situational occurrences theory of job satisfaction (JS)-which posits JS as a function of a finite & stable set of situational characteristics as well as of a broader, more fluid set of situational occurrences-a 2-phase study was conducted involving interviews with 50 students & a survey of 171 students, all of whom worked full- or part-time. Topics explored include why: employees holding seemingly excellent jobs sometimes report low JS, employees holding similarly excellent jobs at the same or different companies express different levels of JS, & JS can change over time even when pay is held constant. It was hypothesized that overall JS is best predicted as a combination of situational characteristics & occurrences, but that situational occurrences play a more dominant role. Both parts of the hypothesis were supported, although differences were noted between male & female employees. 4 Tables, 2 Figures, 1 Appendix, 19 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A sample of 49 people in GB were interviewed about their: patterns of giving to charity, views of charitable bodies, & attitudes toward the recipients of charity. They were also asked to rank order 8 photographs of individuals representing different kinds of need (eg, mentally handicapped, the homeless). Following a qualitative analysis of how the respondents justified their giving & estimated need, the views of 3 groups from different social backgrounds, estimated by relative economic & educational advantage, are compared. The main themes examined include: educational response to requests by charities, local vs overseas aid, & the relative roles of voluntary & state provision. Differences between the 3 groups are noted in the weighting that they gave to these themes. It is concluded that the form of giving varies across the population & that the different locations of people in the social structure will be reflected in their orientations to need & its relief. 2 Tables, 21 References. ¶ The relationships among loneliness, career success, & communication competence are examined to account for the finding of R. A. Data obtained from 350 employees at a state government agency in Calif via questionnaire, a measure of communicative competence, & the Revised UCLA (U of California, Los Angeles) Loneliness Scale show a negative relationship between organizational level & loneliness, & a positive correlation between organizational level & communication competence, for males only; there is no support for the hypothesis that greater communication competence among employees at higher organizational levels conceals a tendency for career success to be accompanied by more loneliness. Findings are discussed in relation to gender differences in work life & personal relationships. 3 Tables, 79 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The behavioral & personality characteristics of 50 Bedouin Arab, 50 urban Arab, 53 kibbutz, & 53 urban Jewish teachers in Israel are compared using the Pupil Control Ideology (PCI) scale developed by D. J. Willower, T. L. Eidell, & W. K. Hoy (The School and Pupil Control Ideology: Penn State Studies No. 24, University Park, Pa: Pennsylvania State U, 1973). Results of a 2-way ANCOVA (kibbutz vs other teacher type), using gender as a factor & sex, tenure, & age as control variables, reveal that the male teacher's orientation was more custodial than the female's, but there was no teacher type X gender interaction. Kibbutz teachers were more humanistic in orientation than urban Jewish & Bedouin Arab types, but were very similar to the urban Arab types, presumably because of the similar nature of the kibbutz & urban Arab social conditions. Older teachers were more custodial than younger teachers, & tenure was related to PCI scores only in the kibbutz & urban Arab comparison. 6 Tables, 24 References. M. Pflum

¶ The prophetic tradition refers to the writing of a poet who implicitly claims a role of inspired leadership. While the tradition was far stronger in the German-speaking world, the tradition ended for most Germans with the Holocaust. The tradition's survival in East Germany is attributed to the influence of Karl Marx, because his works manifest the three characteristics of the prophetic tradition (an ecstatic tone of divine inspiration, a strong moralistic emphasis, & visions of a heroic future). The communist utopia meant for many East German authors a complete means of orientation, almost a religion, & the apparent demise of Marxism has left many writers confused & disoriented. S. Millet

The increasing role of the Australian state in regulating & employing ofessionals has been viewed by some as endangering professional independence. However, analysis points to the flaws in this interventionist rspective, & reveals a more complex link between professional groups the state. A case study is presented of Australian legal aid policy dur- g the 1970s & 1980s, based on written documents & interviews with y actors. It is contended that developments in this field have had mixed erall results for the Australian legal profession. The position of the traitional elite law societies has been challenged by new legal service lawrs who claim that the societies represent neither the public interest nor gal needs. On the other hand, the great majority of the legal aid cases e referred to private lawyers. Salaried legal aid staff are protected from cessive workloads & nonlegal work. These developments reflect the ineasing interdependence of the welfare state & the leagues of new mide-class professionals, & the limits to the attainment of reform program als that can result from this alliance. 82 References. ¶ Though not inconceivable that poor professors should be barred from the classroom, it is unlikely. Professors are not born, but are made, progressing through a lengthy rite of passage that embodies the frightening realities of professoral life & the instrumental & expressive values shared by a university culture. This learning process is probably most responsible for teaching the professor about teaching. Here, the socialization of professors is described in a satirical, irreverent report, based on 25+ years experience in university life. The analysis utilizes a participant-observation approach, decidedly unstructured interviews, & too much reflexive thought. ¶ After outlining the history of personnel/human resources certification in the US, data from a human resource management (HRM) certification survey completed by a representative sample of 280 certified HRM professionals are presented to identify the intrinsic & extrinsic benefits of certification. Results demonstrate that HRM professionals seek certification primarily for professional accomplishment. To ensure examination success, most depend on job experience, study guides, & self-study. While very few indicated that they were encouraged to sit for certification by their employers' job promotion offers, approximately 32% had experienced 1-3 promotions since receiving certification. Moreover, certified professionals are relatively well paid, with salaries varying according to the primary focus of the job & other factors. 3 Tables, 3 Figures, 8 References. ¶ A situated identity perspective is employed to describe the different attributional patterns of females (Fs) & males (Ms) in an academic settin & their differential experiences in the workplace. Gender differences i attributions of success expressed by 233 tenured M political science sociology professors in the US in response to a mail survey are explain in terms of: (1) different identities attributed to Ms & Fs employing th same explanations for success & failure, or (2) the inconsistency betwee actions that confirm a professional (academic) identity & F gender ide tity. Results support the latter explanation but not the former. An edito rial acceptance is considered more professional, but less feminine than rejection. In the eyes of senior colleagues, the modest account of succe typical of F academics, enhances femininity but detracts from profe sionalism. The self-serving account typical of Ms makes the offerer a pear less feminine but more professional. Thus in their situated identi claims, successful academic Fs, but not Ms, must choose between the professional & gender identities. 3 Tables, 1 Appendix, 29 Referenc Adapted from the source document. Loglinear analysis reveals that the social origins of scientists are largely homogeneous across different fields after the strong association between farm origin & biological science is controlled. Direct effect of social origin net of higher education is found to be nonmonotonic along the status hierarchy of social origin & thus cannot be attributed to a unidimensional notion of father's socioeconomic status. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 58 References. ¶ A wave of Japanese immigration to Manchuria began in 1937, after it fell under Japanese control. Soon there were almost 270,000 Japanese immigrants, most of whom lived prosperously. However, with the Chinese victory in 1945, the Japanese became the losers, & about 80,000 starved to death or committed suicide. A few survivors chose to stay in the People's Republic of China, but most returned to Japan in 1946. Attention is focused on the Collective Emigration Assoc, founded in 1940 & still functioning in 1985 to foster community spirit among the former Manchurian settlers. Similar to Japanese organizations in Brazil, this association emphasizes ethnic identity & cooperation among members. Because members were not able to return to their home villages in Japan, they developed a strong bond forged by their common experiences in Manchuria & depended heavily on the group leadership for guidance. This type of community feeling is not encountered in traditional rural studies. 1 Table, 3 Figures, 13 Residents. Adapted from the source document.

Results indicate that victimization rates for all locations generally have been declining since the peak in the mid-1970s, with Rs in M central cities being the most susceptible to victimization, followed by other M & NM Rs, respectively. Certain NM subgroups, however, are as susceptible as their M counterparts who reside outside central cities to particular types of victimization. Observations conducted in the ancient village of Naxxar since 1960 are drawn on to analyze how changes in the annual festivities cycle are related to changes in the texture of community life, especially to the marked reduction in social interaction. The increase in Holy Week celebrations represents a need to recapture lost feelings of belonging. ¶ Croatian agriculture is currently suffering from a long period of neglect by the scientific community & the government. Few advances have been made on small privately owned farms. Thus, Croatians should look abroad for ideas that could be successfully implemented in Croatia. Analysis of agricultural policies pursued since 1960 in France, Greece, Germany, Italy, Portugal, & Spain suggests that the answer to promoting a successful program does not depend on individual structural measures. Socially & economically immediate goals should precede the long-range goal of modernizing Croatian agriculture. Key factors include: attention to the distinct needs of each region; separation of politics from agriculture; modernization of distribution, transportation, financial, & other services; flexibility; ecological concerns; & the role of the government. 5 Tables, 15 References. ¶ Secondary statistical data indicate the unimodal agrarian structure effected in South Korea through land reform in the early 1950s facilitated an agrarian transformation that supported the industrialization process. A combination of state pricing, marketing, & organizational interventions in agriculture resulted in intersectoral commodity flows that provided farm households with economic resources to invest in productivity-enhancing inputs, purchase domestically produced consumer goods, & educate their children. Rapid economic growth during the past three decades & continuing integration into the global economy has made minifarm articulation with the wide political economy increasingly problematic. Small farm size, changes in the domestic market for agricultural commodities, & international trade pressures have increasingly marginalized minifarmers, in important economic & social ways. This disarticulation process suggests that the widely acclaimed benefits of unimodal agrarian structure in South Korea need to be reassessed in the dynamic context of rapid economic growth, increasing internationalization of the economy, & recent political change. 12 Tables. ¶ The renewal of rural life is one of the key tasks facing newly independent Croatia. Although 50% of all Croatians live in the countryside, only 15% are engaged in agricultural work. Renewal is defined as the sum of activities in the context of sustainable development, maximizing the use of new technologies & energy resources to enhance family farming & preserve the environment. Many villages are faced with problems of an imbalance in the age distribution curve of their population; efforts must be made to rejuvenate these communities. Additional changes are needed in the spatial organization of rural regions & in the morphology of agricultural enterprises. ¶ Thanks to its well-developed service sector, the 30.6% of Croatians living along the Adriatic coastal strip contribute a disproportionately large 35.3% of the Croatian gross national product. However, the agricultural sector along the coast has been sadly neglected, leading to a decades-long trend of depopulation of rural areas that only recently began to be reversed. In many villages there are few or no active farmers; thus, rural renewal strategies must take into account other economic activities in addition to agriculture. The need for a highly differentiated regional approach is stressed. In areas affected by the recent war, new projects for stimulating agricultural production should stress economically profitable farms. ¶ An analysis of the responses of landowner organizations in Parag to the demands of farm workers & rural residents, & the role of the ernment in these conflicts, focusing on the Assoc Rural & the Assoc cional de Proprietarios, drawing on interviews with government offi (N not provided), data from court hearings, & secondary data, all lected in 1989/90. Land reform initiated by the government after 1989 fall of dictator Alfredo Stroessner legalized the expropriatio privately held fallow land in various areas. Landowners argued that would lead to overuse of the land & environmental degradation. tempts by landless farm workers to occupy the land were met with vio opposition from landowners, which the government did not attemp control. 1 Table. ¶ The European Working Community for Rural Development & Vill Renewal held its second annual congress in Nov 1991 in Reichenba Sachsen, Austria. This organization, founded in Graz, Austria, in 1988, currently represents twenty-five regions & countries of Euro with the goal of bringing politicians, scientists, & technicians to the c cussion table. Rural areas & villages are promoted as having econor potential, but their environment must be protected. Their value in prov ing a cultural basis for a multicultural, peaceful, & people-centered rope is stressed. Key topics at the conference included: new policies rural spaces; women as pivotal participants in village life; churches & lage development; & the special needs of the very old & very young. Maximum soil te perature variations in the intercrop at varying depths are discussed. tercropping decreased plant height & leaf area index of maize compar to monocropping. Maize root length density in the intercrop & sole cr

¶ According to geographical location theory, cheap land & unskilled labor generally attract certain industries to rural areas. In Israel, kibbutz industries form the major portion of rural industries, in a rural industrialization based more on ideological & organizational factors than on geography. Because of their high level of economic development, compounded by their particular ideological, socioeconomic, & ethnic characteristics, the kibbutzim have had minimal contact with the surrounding lesser-developed communities & regions. Since the 1970s, when the kibbutzim shifted from labor-intensive to capital-intensive industries, & from local marketing to national & international marketing, there has been even less reliance on local hired labor, & more reliance on manufacturing partnerships with other kibbutzim & robotic technologies. The availability of local entrepreneurs has dictated the particular location & type of these collectively-run rural industries: eg, metals, plastics, & food-processing are overrepresented in the kibbutzim, because of the local talent, while science-based industries are relatively few, because of an aversion to hiring highly-skilled, outside specialists. The tension between the collectivist commitment of the kibbutzim & the capitalist structure of the Israeli economy points to an increase in cooperation between kibbutzim & private entrepreneurs & more regional cooperation. 5 Tables, 21 References M. ¶ Mail questionnaire data obtained from 685 husband-wife farm couples in 7 southern & midwestern states are used to investigate factors related to wives' satisfaction with time spent in different work roles. Results indicate that variables reflecting time management are the most important predictors of wives' time use satisfaction; education & nonfarm employment are also significant. It is concluded that, although wives on family farms experience work-role overload relative to their husbands, they are generally satisfied with their time contributions to the home/farm situation. 2 Tables, 22 References. ¶ The objectives of this downstream perspective & assessment of the economics of sustainable agriculture are to: (1) explain to a general audience that sustainability from an economic perspective requires accounting for both on- & off-site effects of economic activity; (2) focus on soil erosion & related water quality impacts (including changing property rights) as the major subset of downstream economics of alternative farming systems; & (3) present empirical results & policy implications of Ohio downstream impacts that would seem to be generalizable to other settings. Soil erosion off-site impacts can be conceptualized as an externality of farm production where the marginal private costs of the farmer diverge from the marginal social cost of all watershed residents. As a result, the joint production of crops & soil loss is higher than socially desirable. Internalizing this externality results in net gains to economic welfare. This analysis is static, so the possibilities for market, technological, & property rights adjustments & changes over time must be recognized. Evidence suggests that downstream costs of soil erosion are not trivial & that they exceed the average on-site costs of soil erosion, implying that some form of tax, subsidy, technical assistance, or regulatory intervention may be appropriate & necessary. Evidence also suggests that downstream costs per unit of soil loss can vary dramatically from site to site, pointing to the extreme importance of targeting control measures (even if chemical input taxes or penalties are based on average downstream impacts) & to the need for revision of property rights or institutions to assure both efficiency & fairness in remediation. 1 Table, 37 References. ¶ While economic difficulties in agriculture cause strain, farmers also experience short- & long-term problems from noneconomic causes. Crucial to weathering difficulties is social support provided by institutions within local communities. Here, questionnaire data obtained in 1987 from 1,103 operators of Mont farms of 30+ acres are analyzed to examine levels of economic & socially based stress. Farmers with debt loads of .4+ were much more likely to be concerned about the finances of their farms & to feel stress. Many (24%) were receiving little or no emotional support from within the community. Multigenerational farmers felt the greatest stress even when their debt loads were low. Debt load was scarcely associated with the number of generations a family had operating a farm. Emotional support was provided about equally to old timers & newcomers, although recent arrivals drew almost exclusively on family & friends, while old timers found additional support within churches, schools, & voluntary assocaitions. Findings document the importance of social cohesion & integration in rural areas. 5 Tables, 2 Figures, 31 References. Modified AA (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ A discussion of French & Italian cases of sharecropping in the late nineteenth & early twentieth centuries is used to argue that share tenancy relations easily accommodate certain types of changes. As long as progress in general & the rise of land productivity in particular is dependent on easily divisible inputs, sharecropping does not need to hold up development. The economic results are fairly equal to that of other forms of tenure. The notion that share tenancy hindered agricultural development is misguided. 4 Tables, 5 Figures. Kishindo, P. A. K., Customary Land Tenure in Malawi: Is It a Constraint on Agricultural Development, African Journal of Sociology, 1990, 3, 2, May, 87-92.

¶ Malawi's economic future depends on agriculture, but the government believes that traditional land tenure creates a barrier to agricultural development. Analysis of existing land tenure arrangements, however, does not support the government's claim that tenants do not invest in long-term improvements–eg, fertilizer & high-yield seeds–because of insecurity about land holding; it is argued that social recognition of the validity of a claim provides this security. Since land is not individually owned, it cannot be used as security for development loans, but other collateral is available. However, customary land tenure does present a problem for economic development because the custom of subdivision & fragmentation of land is not conducive to commercialization. 5 References. M. ¶ Under Yugoslav communist rule, 1945-1990, the strategies for agricultural production in Croatia resulted in low efficiency & low rates of capital formation. A primary cause of the low productivity was the excessive cost of operation in both the private & public sectors, making a true marketing system almost impossible. An analysis is presented of current organizational & production structures of Croatian agriculture. Areas targeted for reform are identified. More attention needs to be given to animal husbandry, viniculture, fish farming, & other sectors. The need to bring Croatia into line with the modern internationalized agricultural economy is emphasized. 6 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Normative rotation of office holding (prescribed office holding followed by return to lower levels of the work organization) within the Israeli kibbutz setting is compared to office succession in other organizations. Survey data are used to examine perceptions of positive & negative rewards of office holding, & satisfaction with life, work, & health among 33 general secretaries & 24 industrial managers from 40 kibbutzim, & 30 Israeli university administrators. T-tests supported the hypotheses that: kibbutz office holders experienced higher levels of negative rewards in comparison to university administrators, kibbutz general secretaries experienced negative rewards more intensely than industrial managers, & the balance of negative & positive rewards for kibbutz office holders was a better predictor of life, work, & health satisfaction than negative or postive rewards alone. These findings indicate that it is the strength of the negative rewards component in the office that makes it understandable why kibbutz office holders would agree to rotate back to the lower ranks after a specified period of time. 5 Tables, 17 References. ¶ Recent attempts to assess capital penetration in agricultural production relations are critiqued. New survey material from 158 farms in upland GB (Cumbria & Staffordshire) are compared to previous surveys of lowland farms (N = 264) to provide a wider spatial basis for an assessment of the uneven nature of agrarian development. The incorporation of aspects of the social reproduction of farm families into the analysis of subsumption exposes the complementary rather than contradictory nature of social reproductive & external capital relations in reproducing different forms of agrarian change. This raises important questions concerning the social sustainability of commodity relations in a postproductivist agrarian context. 5 Tables, 3 Figures, 54 References. As a follow-up to the research of Y. Talmon-Garber in the 1950s & 960s (Family and Community in the Kibbutz, Cambridge, Mass: Harard U Press, 1972 [1957]), which established polarity among kibbutz members based on value orientations, 740 members from 20 kibbutzim were questioned on their value orientations. Findings reveal that 83% were classified in the self-realization value orientation category, 44% in he traditional ideological category, & 25%-35% in the consumerist category; these categories were not mutually exclusive. The correlation between consumerist & self-realization values was positive, but the correlation between ideological & self-realization values was higher. The consumerist-oriented kibbutz members were the least satisfied personally & with kibbutz life, while the ideologically oriented members were the most satisfied. In a multigenerational study, 1,012 members of 3 veteran kibbutzim were questioned on their value orientations & support for proposals for kibbutz change. Consumerist-oriented kibbutz members supported all proposals for change, while the ideologically oriented members rejected all proposals. Ideologically oriented members tended to be older, male, & have more central status in the kibbutzim. The pluralism found in these studies appears to be responsible for the decreasing ability of kibbutz members to reach common decisions. 4 Tables, 12 References. M. ¶ Since its modern origins in the 1950s, the Israeli kibbutz has been transformed from an agricultural community into a capitalist economic entity, & has concomitantly moved from a collective to a more individualistic organization. These changes have been accelerated due to industrialization & the economic crisis of the 1980s. However, there is now a gap between the reality of kibbutz life & ideological rationales. New occupational structures are affecting kibbutz management, control, & ideology. A business structure is now developing wherein the direct involvement of the kibbutz community in the control & structure of the kibbutz business is limited. Because of these trends, it appears that there will no longer be one definitive kibbutz ideology; rather, a continuum of ideologies will exist, ranging from a traditional centralized association to a decentralized association, with diverse structures in between. 24 References. ¶ Mail survey data obtained in 1989 from a random sample of 1,171 agricultural producers in Mont are used to investigate the effects of previous victimization, distance from law enforcement & neighbors, & sufficiency of police patrols on fear of crime. Analysis reveals that prior victimization has the strongest direct effect. Distance from police & neighbors seems to heighten sensitivity to lesser police patrol activity in isolated areas, which in turn increases concern about victimization. It is concluded that fear of crime in rural farm areas at least partially reflects the spatial arrangements & related consequences of living in these regions. 1 Table, 22 References. Damage estimates are given for losses suffered in terms of livestock, land, buildings, machinery, & processing plants. Precise calculations of the sum necessary to rebuild Croatian agriculture are as yet impossible to make, but the cost will be high. ¶ A comparative analysis is presented of changes in the agricultural systems of Eastern European countries during the postcommunist era. In the former East Germany, rapid incorporation into the Federal Republic of Germany led to drastic changes in monetary & economic policies. Production of agricultural commodities fell off rapidly in the uncompetitive eastern sectors. In Hungary, efforts are being made to break up large state-owned farms, replacing them with many privately held small- & mid-sized farms. It is hoped to eliminate most agricultural subsidies. In Czechoslovakia, all privately held land confiscated by the government 1948-1989 is being returned to the owners, & subsidies are being sharply curtailed. In Poland, 75% of the farmland was already in private hands, so the privatization program is moving along more swiftly. Few data are available on the situation in Romania; however, production is falling, & there is a shortage of high-protein foods. Private ownership of plots up to thirty hectares is being offered to agricultural workers who are Bavarian citizens. Croatia should study the experiences of other countries to formulate its own path of development. 14 References. Adapted from the source document. The land-owning oyabun employed the poor kobun to work as agricultural laborers & as drift net fishermen. ¶ The Country Women's Assoc (CWA) of New South Wales, formed in 1922 with rural roots, has spread to all parts of the state, even metropolitan Sydney. The CWA is characterized by: pride in past achievements, respect for women founders, provision of a forum for women in the state, & uncertainty regarding an appropriate future mission. In addition to its two functions--volunteerism & money-raising--the CWA offers opportunities for personal growth, functions as a national lobby, & provides support during personal crisis. Research on the CWA shows that it affirms a domestic role for women because of a paucity of other role models. With social changes in Australia & a younger generation influenced by feminism, the CWA will diminish & function only as a network of older women unless it changes its mission & ideology. A new role for the countrywoman would include a more equitable gender sharing of home, family, business, & community activities. 2 Figures, 1 Appendix, 42 References. ¶ The Japanese chihoken (region) is studied as a new concept in Japanese rural & urbal sociology, emerging as a result of structural changes in both the city & the countryside. The seriousness of current problems & the inadequacies of past approaches to deal effectively with the situation necessitate reflection on & reconstruction of methods & views of community studies. Attention is focused on the problems of rural society exemplified by the Tokai area. Strategies are being developed to promote a sound sense of community based on the coexistence of urban & rural structures. A variety of theoretical problems are examined. 1 Map, References. ¶ Mail questionnaire data from a random smaple of 969 farm famili in 7 states are used to investigate reasons for & against working off th farm as a function of gender & socioeconomic characteristics. Results in dicate that females (Fs) are significantly less likely than males (Ms) t work off the farm to supplement farm income, & significantly more like ly to work off the farm for personal reasons. Logistic regression analys finds that Ms, those employed full-time off the farm, & those with lowe household incomes are most likely to cite economic reasons for workin off the farm. Ms are nearly twice as likely as Fs to cite time constraint as the primary reason for not working off the farm, while only Fs cit family responsibilities; those with higher household incomes & with live stock operations are also most likely to cite lack of time. 4 Tables, 2 References. ¶ The recent Croatian war of independence displaced 700,000 citizens roughly 15% of Croatia's population. Moreover, 26.5% of Croatia's lan was occupied by Yugoslav federal forces. As a result, many rural areas especially in eastern Slavonia, suffered from extensive property damag & depopulation. Now is the time to implement scientifically based plan for revitalizing the agricultural & other sectors of the rural economy Stimulation of market-oriented farming would do much to boost Cro atia's economy. Additionally, new policies of spatial development need t be put into effect that would include manufacturing & tertiary ente prises in rural sectors. These changes should help reverse the trends o rural decay & depopulation, which were aggravated by communist pol cies favoring centralized planning & industrial development at the ex pense of rural initiatives. 9 References. ¶ It is contended that the decline in provision of basic urban services by cities suffering fiscal crises is threatening the ability of poor & working-class populations to maintain themselves. The complex relationship between production for profit & provision of goods & services for social existence is discussed in the context of New York City's recent reform in city government. Seeking to improve service delivery, local organizations & other interest groups have been given a greater voice in decision making affecting the quality of the local environment. ¶ An exploration of the settlement geography of southeast England focuses on the effect of green belt policy on the shape & size of towns in the region. It is contended that green belt planning policy has had a marked effect on the geometry of settlement. Different scaling relations pertaining to settlement size & shape are hypothesized, based on: allometric relations that explain settlement size in terms of built-up area, the urban field within which urban development occurs, & the geometric relations that explain how the irregularity of the envelope bounding urban settlements is related to the areas of built-up development & the urban field. A digital database on settlement boundaries in southeast England is used in the analysis. It is concluded that settlements that have been constrained by green belt policy are more irregular & occupy less of the available space than settlements not so constrained. 3 Tables, 8 Figures, 26 References. Nishiyama, Yaeko, Transliterated title not available (Regional Planning Perspectives in Urban Sociology), Soshiroji, 1988, 33, 1, May, 17-31. (JPN)

¶ A discussion is presented of the contribution that urban sociology can make in solving the increasingly critical problems of cities where centralized administration exerts more & more power while the autonomy of the city's citizenry declines. The Fourth National Development Plan of 1987 will strengthen Tokyo's top position among Japanese cities, decreasing the say of smaller cities. Previous theories of urban sociology cannot account for this because they ignore correlation factors between macro- & micro-level studies. This could be fixed by: (1) respecting the historical traditions & cultural identity of each city; (2) recognizing the many kinds of urban social movements promoting grass-roots democracy, questioning the territorial zones of the national plan & proposing their own alternatives; & (3) lessening the tensions between the vertical relationship of central-local municipalities & the horizontal, cooperative relationship between the social movements of the cities. ¶ The main effects of the recent war of Croatian secession from Yugoslavia include drastic demographic changes. The "Saigon effect" (referring to the flight of people from dangerous rural areas to comparative safety in the cities) has led to conflicts between refugees & indigenous residents. The public utility systems are largely dysfunctional, reducing sanitation levels to medieval standards. Increased national tensions & homogenization due to the victimization principle have led to shifts in the social structure. Psychological problems are common, especially among combat veterans & others exposed to the fighting. Crime & terrorism are on the increase, & black marketeering of humanitarian aid & weapons is a large problem. The final result is a great deterioration of the quality of life, forcing people to spend more & more time just trying to satisfy the basic necessities of life. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Despite central government mandates, 1965-1989, for equality in providing municipal government services & for reducing disparities in revenue, Norwegian municipalities experienced substantial variations in both. Based on local revenue & expenditure data, it is shown that there were increasing revenue variations until the late 1980s, a reversal of an equalization trend that peaked in 1975. While no greater variations in supply of municipal services resulted from this, it is noted that the degree of intersectorial correlations has increased, producing a higher degree of systematic variations. 4 Tables, 3 Figures, 20 References. ¶ The industrialization of Lisbon & Oporto (Portugal) in the late nineteenth century led to an influx of workers from the countryside & a great housing crisis. The first response was the construction of low-quality tenements by private interests. By 1880, the government began to realize its duty to help low-income workers find housing. A periodization shows how the housing strategies adopted 1880-1940 mirrored the various ideologies of the regimes proposing them, ie, the monarchy, the republic, & the estado novo (new state) of António de Oliveira Salazar. Units built directly by the state were always only a small part of the solution. In general, poorer people remained without suitable housing during this period. 11 Tables, 45 References. M. ¶ A study is presented of the simultaneous growth of the urban center & suburbs of Oporto, Portugal, 1900-1950. A literature review shows that many urban demographers view the degree of suburbanization as an index of urban maturity. However, a closer examination of census data reveals that low levels of urban growth do not always coincide with high levels of growth in the suburbs. Special attention is given to: decentralization tendencies, the articulation between urban & suburban spaces, & the interplay between urban & suburban development. Although the suburbs were originally defined in terms of a lifestyle intermediate between rural & urban, it was ultimately spatial considerations that led to the present-day distinction between central city & periphery. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 54 References. ¶ The role of sex in language shift is examined in light of two prevailing sociolinguistic theories: (1) that females (Fs) are traditional & conservative, & therefore learn & use a second language (L2) to a lesser extent than males (Ms), & (2) that Fs are innovative & radical, & therefore learn & use a L2 quickly & more readily than Ms. It is argued that the lower social & economic position of Fs stimulates behaviors, eg, language learning & use, that could lead to upward mobility. Recent & historical research in northern Scandinavia providing evidence for both theories is reviewed, & data are presented from a study of Sámi (Lapp) people in 5 Sámi villages in northern Finland, in which all potential Sámi speakers living 1970-1980 were interviewed (N = 84) about language choice for themselves & other villagers, 1910-1980. Results show that Fs were more likely to retain the use of Sámi prior to the 1940s, & after that, to adopt the use of the L2 (Finnish). This process is partly explained by the role of the school in Sámi society. Prior to WWII, the traditional role of Sámi Fs was equal in prestige to that of Ms, but Fs' status declined after the war. The degree to which societal status influences language adoption & shift remains unclear. 2 Figures, 1 Map, 37 References. ¶ After clarification of basic concepts ("language promotion," "language spread policy" [LSP]), a historical review shows the continuity of present endeavors of the German government to spread the German language abroad since the end of the nineteenth century. Some motives for these endeavors have been long-lived; others are of a more recent origin. The Federal Republic's present LSP is shown to be, at least partially, a reaction to the decline in the international standing of the German language, particularly as compared to English, for which some pertinent evidence is given. In the description of the present LSP, details are presented as to its organizational structure, its financing, the preferred regions & countries, & the domains & persons targeted. The LSP of the other German-speaking countries is also outlined, including the former German Democratic Republic. ¶ Conversations involving some sort of trouble or personal problems on the part of one of the participants are discussed & analyzed. Based on 23 hours of natural Turkish conversations (N unspecified), this kind of "troubles talk" & the way it influences conversation structure is examined through discourse analysis. It is noted that once a trouble is revealed to the interlocutor, the conversation proceeds under certain restrictions, eg, the listener generally takes the speaker seriously, even when the trouble is reported in a lighthearted, laughing manner. The avoidance of returning the laughter is found to be an attempt to help the speaker preserve his "face," as disclosure of troubles can be damaging in that respect. Disagreement (eg, "I'm sure everything will work out fine") is also noted as a typical response to troubles talk. 1 Appendix, 21 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ An examination of negotiating interpersonal & medical talk is presented within the context of interaction between a nurse practitioner & her patients (N = 56) during gynecological exams. Excerpts from their conversations are provided, & a review of relevant literature is given. Specifically, this research found that the nurse practitioner & her patients initiated & responded to cues that shifted the medical frames. This conversational framing & code-switching is examined through a look at "keying devices" & the "functions of asides." It is concluded that the frame shifts exemplified in the conversation analysis serve a rhetorical function in the encounter, facilitating the actual medical examination, & that these interactions exemplify the efficient & empathetic integration of interpersonal & medical dimensions of the medical examination. 32 References. Campus Kiswahili is used by academic staff from the U of Dar es Salaam (Tanzania), & is distinguishable from other English-interfered Swahili variants spoken in Dar es Salaam & elsewhere by the grammatical & semantic correctness of English interferences. It is argued that the sociohistoric background of Tanzanian society accounts for the social valency of Campus Kiswahili. The identity constructed by speakers of Campus Kiswahili is, therefore, an exclusive identity, ie, one that is inaccessible for a majority of the population. ¶ The history of bilingual education research, policy, & practice in ethnically & linguistically fragmented indigenous areas of Mexico is outlined, with emphasis on the need for strengthening bilingualism in indigenous communities. The first 10-lesson unit of Bravo Ahuja's Método audiovisual para la enseñanza del español a hablantes de lenguas indígenas ([Audio-Visual Method for the Teaching of Spanish to Speakers of Indigenous Languages], Mexico City: Secretaría de Educación Pública, 1972), based on the traditional direct method, was evaluated after five years of use with preschool children (N = 5,298). Results of an achievement test on syntactic structures, vocabulary, & question types showed that the influence of Ss' language background on achievement was insignificant. It is concluded that Spanish instruction through students' native languages via special materials for each language was unnecessary. Difficulties in performing further evaluations are related to the current lack of objective studies supporting bilingual & bicultural education policies. Specific research projects are proposed in the areas of bilingualism & interethnic relations. 18 References. J. Hitchcock ¶ Gender-related variation in Amsterdam (Netherlands) vernacular was investigated through a sociolinguistic study that considered such variables as sex, speech, inequality between males & females, education, occupation, & network features. The main goal of this research was to assess the impact of gender on language behavior & child-bearing. Ss (N = 48 couples) were visited at home, & each partner was interviewed separately. Results describe the influence on language behavior of sex, children, females' employment, education, occupation, & network index. It is concluded that males use Amsterdam vernacular significantly more often, & that the forces underlying speech differentiation are manifold & rooted in a complex structure of interacting variables. 12 Tables, 4 Figures, 28 References. ¶ In conversations between bilinguals, each of whom is a learner of the other's language, two local patterns of code-switching may emerge: (1) in mutual convergence or complementary schismogenesis, each speaker attempts to speak the interlocutor's native language; conversations characterized by this pattern reveal that the interlocutors are having difficulty agreeing on a shared norm for conversational code choice; & (2) in conversations characterized by compliance, each speaker agrees with & complies with the interlocutor's code choice, even if the interlocutor chooses to change the code during the conversation; in such conversations, the speakers are successful in establishing a shared code or a mode of code choice for future conversations. It is argued that a pattern of compliance is ultimately more accommodating than convergence, contrary to the claims of speech accommodation theory. 20 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An examination of the differences gender makes in language use, focusing on recent work on the English "tag question." Results from two studies address the issues of dominance & difference, two approaches to the English tag question that consider cultural factors. It is argued that both these positions are unsatisfactory. Three analyses of the tag question are provided along with a detailed explanation & definition of dominance & difference as related to these issues. Study 1 (N unspecified) consisted of an examination of casual conversation, focusing on data from the Survey of English usage. Findings indicate that males use a greater % of modal tags & females a greater % of affective ones. Study 2, an asymmetrical discourse study, focused on the question of the conversational role. Data were examined from three contexts: a classroom, a doctor-patient setting, & a TV talk show. Tag questions were isolated using J. Holmes's framework ("Hedging Your Bets and Sitting on the Fence: Some Evidence for Hedges as Support Structures," Te Reo, 1984, 27, 47-62). Findings indicate that males use more than twice as many modal tags, whereas females use twice as many affective tags. Conclusions drawn focus on "not gender difference, but the difference gender makes." 4 Tables, 20 References. H. L. Stidger

Cifuentes, Barbara, Language Policy in Mexico, UM International Journal of the Sociology of Language, 1992, 96, 9-17.

¶ The history of the status of Spanish & the indigenous languages of Mexico is traced from the conquest through the nineteenth century. Conflicts between Castilianizing policy & administrative & ecclesiastical practice characterize the colonial period, at the end of which approximately 80% of the population of Mexico still did not use Spanish as a vehicular language. The rapid ascendancy of Spanish after Mexican independence is attributed to the resettlement of millions of Indians outside their communities of origin & their consequent failure to pass their native languages on to their children. The influence of education in this process was minimal. Within indigenous communities, the extension of trade networks & separation of language functions provided the conditions for the emergence of diglossic bilingualism, with Spanish or an indigenous language in the role of vehicular language. At the same time, although multilingualism was seen as a barrier to national progress, the study of indigenous languages was recommended as part of a search for knowledge about the nation's past. 22 References. ¶ The sociolinguistic context of Mexico is sketched with emphasis on the conflict between Spanish & the large number of different indigenous languages, resulting in great variety among situations in which bilingualism develops. In light of current gains in recognition of surviving indigenous languages & cultures, official policies & bilingual & bicultural education are contrasted with the realities of practice: the low educational level of bilingual instructors; the use of materials written in Spanish or, if written in an indigenous language, based on Spanish linguistic norms; the lack of standardization of indigenous languages, the dialectal fragmentation of which restricts the geographic scope of many teaching materials; a parental view of education as a key to urban migration & negative parental evaluation of the native language; & extreme variation in classroom language use from school to school. These incongruities must be overcome for official policy to be put into practice, allowing the indigenous peoples to participate in their own development. 1 Table, 32 References. But a negotiation perspective, follo[illegible]ing the conversation analysis tradition of research on greetings & tro[illegible]bles telling, fits the discursive realities better. iwi language, spoken on Bathurst & Melville Islands off Austra-

d to intense pressure from contact with English only since the early years of the twentieth century. During this period, the original hunter-gatherer society has adopted a money economy & the Christian religion. Unlike many such communities, Tiwi speakers have not entered into a language-shift process. Instead there has been a fairly radical restructuring of Tiwi in the direction of simplification. Patterns of this restructuring are discussed. The dilemma facing the Tiwi is whether to in-¶ The social network theory approach attempts to explain intracommunity linguistic variation in socioeconomically homogeneous areas in terms of individuals' social ties. To test the validity of this approach, social & linguistic data were collected from randomly selected residents of a Detroit, Mich, black inner-city neighborhood in 4 age groups: 18-25, 26-39, 40-59 (N = 16 each), & 60+ (N = 18). The strength of the respondents' (Rs') connections to their neighborhood was measured by means of a vernacular culture index (VCI), a questionnaire consisting of 10 statements to be assigned truth values from 1 to 4. Rs' linguistic behavior was quantified based on taped interviews, which were examined for potential & actual occurrences of the Black English (BE) variants of 6 linguistic variables. Analyses of variance reveal consistent statistically significant correlations between high VCI scores, reflecting strong neighborhood ties, & the choice of BE variants of linguistic variables, & that older age groups (40-59, 60+) are more likely to use BE variants than are younger Ss. Results demonstrate that such social network theory variables as social isolation & sociocultural orientation are important predictors of linguistic variation. 7 Tables, 33 References. Adapted from ¶ "Skipping" classes in high school is seen as a cultural form of language behavior among a group of 4 "skippers," their parents, & teachers (N = 12). This ethnographic study focused on the analysis of skipping as a "text" or "text analogue" that was open to interpretation by fellow "skippers," by members of the school community, & by communication researchers. Several categories of skippers are delineated, including "smart" & "don't-care" skippers. The speech style of skippers was shown to include structure, style, & mode that could be compared to the various components of games, eg, players, objectives, rules, suggestions for better play, methods of keeping score, & consequences for winners & losers.

Drug use & abuse among these students is discussed. Three primary functions of skipping are identified, including creating tension in play/work, belonging/not belonging, & power & control dimensions of skippers' life at school & at home. It is concluded that both smart & don'tcare skippers are at risk of alienation from their peers & from adults within the school. Implications are drawn for the primary prevention of two major adolescent health & developmental problems: drug involvement & school dropout. 1 Table, 32 References. Adapted from the source

Mandarin Babytalk and the Voice of Authority, Journal of Multil-

¶ A type of register variation of code-switching referred to as "babytalk"–talk of/to babies/young children–is examined, based on videotapes of naturally occurring conversation among Mandarin Chinese-speaking children (N = 130, ages 2-6) & teachers (N = 14) in 2 Taiwan preschools. Considering babytalk as one type of code-switching adds a new perspective to studies of child language acquisition & socialization, highlighting the need for a developmental perspective & more sensitivity to local constructions of person & society in the code-switching literature. The claim that babytalk is a universal speech register is examined in light of cross-cultural evidence, including the author's Chinese data. In talking to children, Chinese teachers code-switch between the unmarked voice of authority & a babytalk register. It is argued that these two speech styles are motivated by Chinese cultural assumptions about children & childhood. 1 Table, 40 References. Adapted from the source document.

Three levels of analysis of bilingualism are distinguished–linguistic, situational, & pragmatic. Nahuatl dialectal fragmentation & a continuum of degrees of language maintenance & shift are related to different Nahuatl-Spanish conflict patterns. ¶ The history of Greek diglossia, consisting of Katharevousa (pure) & Demotic (public), is reviewed from a sociolinguistic perspective, which examines the social functions of each language. The popular, metalinguistic theory of language decline is questioned. In the early nineteenth century & during the formation of the Greek state, the language of Ancient Greece was adopted to facilitate national identity. This artificial, purified form of spoken Greek was forced onto a nation already speaking mutually intelligible varieties of Greek. Pure Greek became associated with authoritarian politics. During the interwar period, Demotic Greek identified its users as prodemocratic. Diglossia continued until the 1976 reform that marked the transition to capitalism. Demotic usage became generalized & lost much of its political impact. Demotic gradually replaced Katharevousa in formal contexts. Between 1930 & the 1950s, use of Demotic without Katharevousa features was a mark of the intellectual elite. The current debate about the decline of Greek is presented as a result of a crisis of national identity caused by apprehension toward European integration. 57 References. The works offer a minute reading of Arthur Rimbaud's poems & attempt to verify the hypothesis, shared with other Rimbaud scholars, that the poems have an obscene dimension so far neutralized in scholarship. Murphy employs two methodologies: (1) a lexicological method that reactivates a systematic obscenity by deciphering vocabulary codes (eg, "tears" also signify "sperm"); & (2) an intertextual method that examines fictive dedications & signatures & reveals a facet of the poems directed toward official & academic art. While Murphy's analysis of the poems' subversiveness is clear & effective, he fails to indicate the connections between Rimbaud's thought & contemporary thought. I. Shagrir

Both English & Polish compliments are highly formulaic, utilizing a small set of syntactic & semantic formulas for expression; the two formula sets show many similarities & few differences in forms used to encode compliments One major difference in the relative frequencies of compliment topics in the English & Polish data, is the high incidence of possession compliments in Polish, which is tied to the ethnography of everyday life in Poland at the time of the fieldwork (1983-1988). This led to the thesis that an analyzable relation exists between argument as a social activity & interruption as the expression of or way of framing that activity. ¶ Most sociolinguistic studies on gender differences seem to have concentrated more on female (F) than on male (M) speakers. Discussed here are some aspects of the syntax of middle- & upper-class, middle-aged Ms (N = 6) in Oslo, Norway, selected because, socially, they represented the complete opposite of any F group. Additional data are drawn from a sociolinguistic survey (N = 48 respondents) in the 1970s. It is shown that the M group used longer sentences & made fewer deviations from the rules of written syntax than any other social group. The salient syntactic features found seem to establish the middle-aged M group as the one most preoccupied with correct syntactic form, contradicting the repeated claim in sociolinguistic studies that F speakers tend to follow a more prestigious or official language use than do Ms. 9 Tables, 18 References. ¶ An investigation of one facet of the language socialization process of deaf children with deaf parents, ie, how they learn to get attention as a speaker in order to participate in an American Sign Language (ASL) conversation. An hour-long dinner attended by deaf children (N = 3, ages 3-6), their 2 deaf mothers, & a deaf researcher was videotaped. Small segments of the interaction, transcribed from the videotape, show not only successful & unsuccessful attention-getting strategies used by one deaf child in the group, but also adult & peer responses to her novice-like efforts. The S's behaviors demonstrate that although she could perform many culturally appropriate attention-getting behaviors (eg, tapping, hand-waving, eye-gaze), she was still in the process of developing awareness of the impact of the various strategies & the ability to judge pragmatic conditions appropriate to their use. The mothers' & peers' cooperation helped to facilitate the child's participation, by modeling specifically deaf discourse strategies for communication in a multiparty setting. Such modeling enables deaf children in a deaf context to become autonomous partners in interaction with their parents & peers at an early age. 23 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Verbal commentary offered in videotapes of live TV coverage of 2 female (F) & male (M) athletic events was analyzed: the "final four" of the F & M 1989 National Collegiate Athletic Assoc basketball tournaments, & the F & M singles, doubles, & mixed-doubles matches of the 1989 US Open tennis tournament. Although results reveal less overtly sexist commentary than has been observed in past research, 2 categories of difference do emerge: (1) gender marking & (2) a "hierarchy of naming" by gender &, to a certain extent, by race. These differences are described & analyzed in light of feminist analyses of gendered language. It is concluded that TV sport commentary contributes to the construction of gender & racial hierarchies by marking F sports & athletes as "other," by infantilizing F athletes (&, to a certain extent, M athletes of color), & by framing the accomplishments of F athletes ambivalently. 3 Tables, 65 References. ¶ The methodological frameworks provided by the work of William Labov (eg, Sociolinguistic Patterns, Philadelphia: Pennsylvania U Press, 1972) & John J. Gumperz (eg, Discourse Strategies, Cambridge: Cambridge U Press, 1982) are critiqued, with special emphasis on the question of observer effect in community-level investigations of urban vernaculars. Labov's procedures for data collection & analysis, though currently less popular than previously, remain both replicable & adaptable for further research. Sociolinguistic research in bilingual minority settings is better accomplished using Gumperz's approaches, although they raise the problem of accountability. Material from two research projects with linguistic minority communities are presented & examined in reference to the distinct frameworks of Labov & Gumperz. The effect of the relationship between the researcher & the people in the field upon these language samples is emphasized, as well as how these effects must be considered at the level of data analysis & interpretation. Researchers in bilingual communities are encouraged to adopt a two-step study design that combines the insights of the interpretive method & the systematic approach to data gathering outlined by Labov. Both accountability & openness in data collection & analysis need to be considered. 39 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ In sociolinguistics, approaches using the variables of socioeconomic class & social network have often been thought unrelated. Models of socioeconomic structure are designed to elucidate large scale processes, whereas social network theory is based on study of social organization at the interpersonal level. An attempt is made to outline a sociolinguistic model that integrates both types of variables into a coherent whole. This model rejects the usual theory of speech communities in favor of a conflict-based macrolevel of social class linked to a consensus-based microlevel of interpersonal networks. Various research findings demonstrate that loose-knit social networks facilitate linguistic innovation. The existence of loose ties within a network therefore give rise to conflicting norms. It is suggested that such weak ties characterize relations between socioeconomic classes. This network model can be integrated into the macro-sociological model proposed by Thomas Højrup ("The Concept of Life Mode: A Form-Specifying Mode of Analysis Applied to Contemporary Western Europe," Ethnologia Scandinavia, 1983, 1-50). Højrup considers social class to be a process that segregates the population into distinct "life-modes." It is argued that the different types of network structure characteristic of different classes arise from life-mode distinctions. Socioeconomic & network variables can thus be combined in a single model. 1 Table, 3 Figures, 68 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An overt racial conflict in New Zealand in 1979 is evaluated using the methods of discourse analysis. Two patterns of language use by Pakeha New Zealanders are introduced, ideas & images used in public discourse to account for Māori/Pakeha relations. The relevance & importance of these patterns are examined in an opinion column written on the subject of local race relations by a prominent Pakeha businessman in 1988. Insights are offered into the durability & function of these patterns & their role as a working component of a much larger Pakeha ideology of Maori/Pakeha relations. 46 References. ¶ Language-contact issues are discussed, with focus on the conflicts that can arise in this context. It is noted that neither conflict nor contact can actually occur between languages; this is only possible between speakers of languages. Factors that give rise to language conflicts (eg, differing values & attitudes) are identified & various levels of language contact/conflict are characterized, eg, verbal, nonverbal, & paralinguistic. The shift toward European unification is seen as an opportunity for resolving past conflicts in order to ensure harmony in the multilingual Europe of 1993. 25 References. ¶ Academic language in technical journals published in English is often too complex in terms of syntax & discourse structure for foreign students & professionals, & for native speakers of English. A random selection of articles in Language & American Anthropologist, which are aimed at broad audiences, is examined to illustrate the problems associated with technical writing. The major problems include vocabulary, attributive phrases, generic expressions, adverbials, redundancy, parenthetical expressions, & complex sentences. Examples of each difficulty are offered. The sociolinguistic implications of technical language & academic writing are addressed. The increasing specialization among academics results in more diverse academic dialects, which is exacerbated by a lack of cross-discipline interactions. Academics are urged to write clearly in plain language, reserving specialized vocabulary for situations where it cannot be avoided. 3 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The merits of applying the concept of conversational style in the analysis of conversation & gender differences are discussed & casual conversation is analyzed in 3 groups–6 male-male (M) dyads, 6 female-female (F) dyads, & 6 husband-wife dyads–in the course of 18 conversations that were tape-recorded & transcribed. Variation was found both in choice of topic & strategies for topic change. Fs, both when speaking to Fs & to their spouses, preferred more personal topics, shifted topics more abruptly, & introduced topics without hesitation–features of high-involvement style. Cooperative overlap was also more frequent among Fs than Ms, & Fs also used more back-channeling signals, suggesting that they are better listeners. In the married group, Fs talked more & showed more initiative in finding topics of conversation than did Ms. There were relatively many interruptions & few instances of cooperative overlap & back-channeling signals in husband-wife conversation, & the high-involvement style was uncommon. 3 Tables, 23 References. ¶ The importance of epistemic markers in language socialization is discussed from the perspective of the second-language classroom, with a broader goal of fully understanding what second-language learners must acquire in order to become competent members of the target-language community. A conversation among Japanese teachers (N = 3) outside the classroom is analyzed to investigate the linguistic resources for constituting epistemic stance in Japanese. Like English, Japanese evidentiality can be marked with adverbials & idiomatic phrases. Japanese also uses many sentence-final particles that directly index interactive contexts. The function of epistemic markers in Japanese discourse is examined, focusing on how epistemic markers, eg, sentence-final particles, adverbials, & hedges, function to reduce speaker responsibility. 28 References. ¶ An adapted bargaining process analysis coding scheme is used to determine how pediatrician-parent pairs (N = 8 doctors & 30 mothers) sustain traditional roles or encourage mutual involvement. It is demonstrated that pediatricians rely on use of requests, whereas parents often use confirming messages. In interactions where parents present specific concerns, they use more requests than in situations where parents voice no specific concerns. In conversations where parents do not raise concerns, pediatricians are less confirming & parents more confirming than when parents present issues. Many options exist to promote involvement other than those observed in this project; change may create more opportunities to discuss areas of misunderstanding or disagreement regarding child care & development. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 26 References. ¶ A description & analysis of the speech behavior of the German speech community in Canberra, Australia. Rather than focusing on the linguistic competence of these speakers, the study focuses on their use of German &/or English in different situations, from the perspective of the sociology of language. A historical sketch of German immigration to Australia since the eighteenth century is provided as background. Sociolinguistic questionnaires were completed by 59 households. Results show that German language use is related to cultural core values associated with the social meanings of the country of origin. The main factors promoting first language (German) use are friendship networks & clubs/festivities. The home or family domain is also an important non-English-speaking context. Language maintenance in this instance appears to be based largely on the traditional factors of family domain & social activities. 2 Tables, 18 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An investigation of the way in which one speaker makes use of various poetic devices in argumentations in an analysis of a sociolinguistic interview that reveals repeated presentation of ideas, words, expressions, & structures. Explanations of the use of argumentation are provided along with a synopsis of the poetic aspects of ordinary conversation that reveals the functional importance of various poetic devices in the ongoing activity of verbal interaction. The analysis of the interview reveals recurrent patterns & combinations of patterns associated with the speaker's tendency to segment an idea or to view it from diverse perspectives. Roberts, Alasdair (Northern Coll, Aberdeen AB9 1FA Scotland), Parental Attitudes to Gaelic-Medium Education in the Western Isles of Scotland, Journal of Multilingual and Multicultural Development, 1991, 12, 4, 253-269.

Gaelic-medium education was recently introduced to all schools of the estern Isles as part of a bilingual education policy. According to this licy, Gaelic-speaking children are to be as literate & fluent in Gaelic in English by the end of primary school & English-speaking children will have the resources to learn Gaelic if their parents wish. The first Gaelic-medium unit in the Western Isles was initiated in 1986, & at the time the present survey was conducted there were seven such units. This survey was commissioned in an attempt to distinguish future levels of demand for the Gaelic-medium option. Mail questionnaire data from 329 parents with children expected to begin school in Aug 1989/90 reveal that the majority do not speak Gaelic at home, but strongly support the idea of their children becoming bilingual. Roughly 50% of the respondents said they would enter their children in Gaelic-medium units if available, although there was some confusion over the distinction between Gaelic-medium & bilingual education. 9 Tables, 22 References. ¶ The issue of examining speech acts across cultures has been addressed in the Cross Cultural Speech Act Realization Project (CCSARP), initiated in 1982. The methodology used in this project raises issues that should be addressed in order to further develop speech act research. One such issue is the construction of questionnaires or discourse-completion tests (DCTs). A study was conducted in which 2 forms of DCT–1 including hearer response, the other not–were administered to 36 native speakers of American English. Situations outlined in the questionnaire provided a variety of combinations of social distance & social dominance. ¶ Spanish is the fifth most spoken language in the world (circa 325 million speakers), in Central & South America, México, & Spain. However, a well-defined policy for spreading the language has not been present until very recently. The Spanish Empire in the sixteenth century was the trigger for expanding the language, but Spaniards did not develop the need for learning other languages or expanding their own: their role in the world made everybody else learn Spanish. In the last decades, the importance of Spanish has increased; the potential of South America is a main reason for commercial interchange & linguistic needs. The European Economic Community (EEC) has increased the need for learning two or more languages in every member country; since Spain entered the EEC, its isolation from the rest of Europe came to an end. In the early 1980s, the need for a specific language policy for the expansion of Spanish language & culture was recognized in governmental circles. The Instit Cervantes is planned to be the key institution for the spread of Spanish. Only Spain, among the many Spanish-speaking countries, is responsible for such an initiative. The spread of cultural & linguistic features shared by the "Spanish world" (the concept of "Hispanidad") is one of the main goals officially stated. 1 Table, 12 References. Modified AA

¶ When the frontier between Mexico & Guatemala was drawn, it separated speakers of five Mayan groups; after the Mexican revolution, the situation became increasingly difficult for the people who had thus been separated. The historical aspects of the present-day situation must be reconstructed from oral reports, which are obtained with difficulty as Mayan speakers have been intimidated & accused of not being Mexican when heard speaking supposedly alien Guatemalan tongues. Although the legal status of the frontier languages & their speakers has improved since 1980, the hostility engendered by previous policies has persisted. The widespread characterization of Guatemalan refugees as communists has fostered renewed disparagement of the frontier cultures & maladministration of bilingual programs. ¶ Findings from a review of the literature on attitudes toward Black English Vernacular (BEV) are compared to the opinions & experiences of African American professors, staff, & students at a Catholic university (N = 16, mean age 31). Interviews by 2 white researchers were recorded & transcribed. Unlike previous studies, the informants were not dominant BEV speakers. The interviews reveal differences in the names & labels used & accepted for BEV. Over 50% of the informants called BEV "slang." Others called it "nonstandard English," "jive," & "street talk." Informants reported that not all African Americans speak BEV, & that not only African Americans speak BEV. Some Euro-Americans & Latinos are known to use the dialect. Some informants recognized BEV as one of several dialects of nonstandard English that need not be labeled. Few of the informants viewed BEV as a full linguistic system. BEV is perceived as widely recognized in popular culture because of interaction that followed desegregation, & more recently through commercialized rap music. The heterogeneity of opinions & attitudes is neither surprising nor problematic, demonstrating that African Americans do not speak with a single voice. Experience with BEV & the necessity of knowing the dialect are also discussed. 2 Appendixes, 45 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ In describing the different types of Wolof/French code-switching used in Dakar, the assumption that the use of two languages within a single conversation violates a norm & must therefore be explained is questioned. In Dakar, the use of "purposive" code-switching by bilinguals is relatively uncommon, as is the use of Wolof & French in their pure forms. The most common mode of speech among urban bilinguals is so-called Urban Wolof, a fluid switching between Wolof & French. It is suggested that Urban Wolof be considered a third & separate code rather than the alternate use of two languages, & that the sociolinguistic models currently available in the code-switching literature are not appropriate for the analysis of this bilingual phenomenon. Two problematic aspects of Urban Wolof are presented: (1) its status as a distinct "language," & (2) the attitudes surrounding its use. In both cases, it is shown from data obtained through a two-part inteview/questionnaire that the views of Urban Wolof speakers (N = 35, ages 20-51+) provide a rich picture of the position of Urban Wolof & help to predict its future role in the urban Senegalese community. ¶ Some women from the women's liberation movement in Denmark have argued that there is & should be a separate women's language representing the female (F) universe. This thesis is discussed here, & it is shown that: (1) the similar grammatical constructions in Danish, appendage questions, are in no way particular to Fs; & (2) in this sense of the word, there is no language specific for Fs. According to another concept, language is the communication strategy chosen in a given situation, exemplified by the pattern of interruption between interlocutors in turn-taking. An empirical investigation (N = 37 Ss) found that middle-class (Mc) males (Ms) tended to be dominating & ambitious, & Mc Fs, correct & orthodox; working-class (Wc) Ms were obstinate & informal, & Wc Fs behaved on the average on all the parameters. It is posited that, because of their socialization, Ms & Fs have access to only half of the psychological characteristics & behavioral strategies distributed in the society. The goal must be unification with the other half. 18 References. Modified AA

The older Brusselers have the reputation of switching frequently between the local varieties of Dutch & French; the younger generations switch less often. The disappearance of intrasentential code-switching is shown to be related to knowledge of Standard Belgian Dutch, the southern variant of Standard Dutch, among other factors. Informants with a good knowledge of Standard Dutch (eg, because they attended Dutch-speaking schools) switch less often than those who do not master this code. Apart from this, intrasentential code-switching is probably no longer a generalized practice in Brussels due to tensions between Belgium's linguistic groups. 3 Tables, 14 References. ¶ An examination of the adequacy of speech act theory as a means for analyzing & explaining ordinary conversation. Examples presented by critics of this speech act perspective are discussed. Emphasis is placed on the issue of whether speech act theory can deal effectively with the wide variety of ordinary conversational language usage. It is argued that if speech act theory is conceived of as a dynamic set of insights, it can provide an effective approach to understanding the functioning of individual utterances in conversation, & the relations between those utterances. 23 References. ¶ Four types of analysis used to describe structure in on-off vocal activity were applied to a data set from adult-adult conversations between strangers (N = 130 males & 130 females, ages 18-25). Automatic Vocal Transaction Analysis parameters, basic descriptive statistics, time series regression, & frequency domain analysis were compared. Factor analysis & correlations were performed to determine whether the statistics that describe different aspects of social interaction tempo or structure form distinct groups. Factor analysis on the 14 interaction structure variables obtained in preliminary analyses revealed 4 dimensions: partner coordination, within-speaker predictability, interruptions/pauses, & talkativeness. Findings emphasize the equivalence between time & frequency domain analysis. Future research would benefit from selecting variables that cover as many of these four dimensions as possible. 2 Tables, 28 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ (Originally published in the Vienna Music Journal, 1936, 23, 26-27, 18 May, 13-19.) Reflections are offered on the musical legacy of Gustav Mahler, whose music endeavored to break out of the narrow boundaries of bourgeois music by undermining the significance of theme as objectification. Parody in Mahler's work is discussed, as is the composer's unique aesthetic, which is formed around the banalities of life. Several works by Mahler are interpreted sociologically. W. ¶ A semiotic ethnography & ethnomusicological comparison of the rhetoric of violence found in two increasingly popular musical forms, rap & country. Based on the production-of-culture perspective, musical genres are considered socially constructed organizing principles & lyrics, the primary data, are viewed as ensembles of texts. Presenting illustrative examples, rap & county songs are examined as they present claims concerning the focal concerns of: trouble, ie, the violent crimes of murder, manslaughter, & assault; & toughness, ie, physical prowess & masculinity. Hidden resemblances between rap & country are identified, noting parallels between these essentially incompatible musical domains. 85 References. Adapted from the source document. Corseuil, Anelise Reich (Wayne State U, Detroit MI 48202), Bye Bye Brazil* and the Postmodernist Context, Michigan Academician, 1992, 24, 4, summer, 551-557.

¶ Refuting an ahistoricist analysis of Carlos Diegues's film Bye Bye Brazil, it is shown that the development of the film's narrative discourse & use of different aesthetic forms highlights historical displacement among northern & northeastern Brazilians. The film focuses on change in Brazil during the 1970s related to increased Americanization & multinationalization amidst traditional values & economies. First-World critic Frederic Jameson has suggested (eg, see "Postmodernism, or the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism," New Left Review, 1984, 146, July-Aug, 30-69) that postmodernism develops nonhistorical representations, & that Third-World texts are merely nationalist & allegorical. He neglects to recognize legitimacy of a Third World source for postmodern work, perpetuating the marginalization of its discourse. 10 References. J. ¶ A sociocultural study of the Environnements, a little-known avant-garde environmental sculptural movement that appeared in Quebec in the 1950s & culminated in the 1980s. The works created by the movement 1951-1991 are analyzed chronologically with reference to two axes: (1) the three phrases of cultural forms observable in Quebecois society–traditional, modern (industrial/urban), & postmodern (decisional/cybernetic); & (2) the three phrases in the evolution of Quebecois sculpture–commemorative monumentality, technical ornamentality, & interactive environmentality. An attempt is made to identify the specificity of Quebecois postmodernism, & to discern the role of environmental sculpture as either reflecting or modifying the social sphere. 12 Tables, 3 Photographs. ¶ Recent trends affecting modern architecture are reviewed: criticisms of the modern movement in architecture & urbanism, coupled with social & economic crises, have seriously discredited the architectural institution; the crisis of functionalism that freed architects from the logic of need has rendered architecture autoreferential; the entrance of engineers, designers, & environmentalists to urban design has created additional difficulty. It is suggested that to ensure its survival & legitimacy, contemporary architecture should seize an active role in defining the public sphere, through reinforcing its artistic vocation & making representation of the public its capital mission. ¶ Puy du Fou, a French chateau in the northwest region of Vendée, has been the site of the Puy du Fou show since 1977. Similar to sound & light shows in other old castles, this unique ethnographic show is identified with a reinvested Vendée, building on the region's cultural & historical heritage. The staged production is based loosely on Vendée history, highlighting the 1793 counterrevolution, & the subsequent development of an agrarian rural society during the nineteenth century. This quasi-mythical representation of the Vendée past is articulated by performers who group together into symbolic villages, resembling the administrative communes. The Puyfolais actors typify the Vendée native, loyal to traditional values, yet ready to accept modern society. As the most authentic of Vendée symbols, the concept of the Puy du Fou show & its various related activities & clubs are being expanded by the show's creator into the political arena, aiming for local & then national exposure. 5 Illustrations. The influence of these themes is traced in his paintings, especially in Crows over the Wheatfield & La Berceuse, & are related to the dynamics of suicide. 35 References. AA

Translated by Michèle Mittner.

¶ The social construction of authenticity is illustrated by the history of country music in the US. Building on the demand for old-time music, it took nearly twenty years of collaboration between performers, radio stations, record companies, & movie moguls to create a genuine popular culture of country music. The creation of the "hillbilly" & the "singing cowboy" were welcome alternatives to earlier unpopular attempts by auto manufacturer Henry Ford to revive old-time music & dance in the 1920s. Because of their metropolitan perspective, record industry entrepreneurs' efforts to market country music as a commercial style were premature. The antimodernist retro trend on the radio in the 1920s was part of a movement to preserve purely Anglo Saxon forms of music, but appeared artificial taken out of its rural context. The demise of retro music was saved by developments in Tenn (the "Grand Ole Opry"; the "Beverly Hillbillies"), & the cinematic debut of the singing cowboys (Gene Autry, Tex Ritter, & Roy Rogers). 7 Photographs. ¶ Any contact with art unavoidably brings about a confrontation with time, since works of art belong to specific time epochs. For those interested in art, art museums function as a "cultural time machine"; in few other places can one discern the shifts between historical periods so keenly. Large museums are organized not by theme, but by chronological order of the works displayed; smaller museums are often dedicated to a single period, usually the modern era. The importance of time in the appreciation of art is emphasized. 11 References. M. Meeks

¶ A literature review shows that the narrator's role is largely neglected in international folktale research due to the dominant historical perspective of the discipline. The Grimm brother's Kinder- und Hausmärchen ((Children's Stories and Fairy Tales) Berlin, 1812) regarded folktales as holdovers of pre-Christian mythology, useful as a source for obtaining insights into the previous stages of a culture. In this context, the narrators functioned only as anonymous bearers of tradition. In this century, the historical orientation gave way to approaches focusing more on the narrators, context, function, & meaning of folktales. Special attention is given to the role of the 1934 creation of the Folklore Commission by the Royal Dutch Academy of Sciences, which later became the Folklore Division of the P.J. Meertens Instit. Various reform efforts since 1968 led to modifications requiring textbooks to follow state-established curriculum. Although the curriculum is determined by the state, the decision to publish a new book is purely economic & is governed by business interests; 83+% of the authors are men, & 58+% have written more than 1 textbook. ¶ The present crisis facing intellectuals & the university is rooted in the collapse of the boundaries that traditionally have marked out a position of privileged particularity for them. This collapse has exposed a contradiction in the goals of the university & affirmative action (AA): the former is committed to excellence & the cultivation of distinction, while the latter is obliged to seek equity & uniformity. It is concluded that AA undermines academic standards as well as the university's nonbureaucratic collegiality. ¶ For almost a quarter of a century, schools & colleges have a formative influence on the lives of a growing number of people in modern society, with 66+% of today's population ages 5-25 going to schools, seminars, & lectures. Examined here is whether this trend toward drawing on a time series analysis of the basic processes & historical forms of Western society to describe the various waves of expansion of formal education, with focus on the Swiss educational system. Social competitiveness between individuals & groups, is suggested to explain the spiralling expansion of education. The dynamics of the expansion, which leads to a growing "over-education," have limits, in as much as there is a given top limit. In addition, the education system is being challenged by the microelectronic revolution. For these reasons, a new educational concept is being discussed–the concept of life-long learning. 3 Tables. ¶ Higher education in the US is compared with the tenets of a socialist state in that both systems put the interests of the institution before that of the individual. Administrators who practice "academic socialism" are said to embrace a philosophy that: rewards or punishes across the board, takes the easiest route to resolve conflicts, has sold out to industrial concerns, & forgets educational traditions & values. In discussing this topic, a critique is offered of E. D. Hirsch, Jr.'s Cultural Literacy (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987) & Allan Bloom's The Closing of the American Mind (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987). Hirsch & Bloom are said to possess "a tenure-like unwillingness to criticize colleagues & administrators." If higher education could implement the tenets of cultural literacy, promoted by Hirsch, or replace relativism with the Platonic ideal promoted by Bloom, problems would still exist because too many administrators have become academic socialists, & too many teachers mediocre. To resolve such problems, administrators must: (1) motivate or reassign tasks of nonproductive professors; (2) establish good ties with industry, but not allow it to dictate curricula; (3) allow budget flexibility so that taxpayer money is not squandered; (4) grant significant merit pay to good professors; & (5) maintain morale during hard economic times. 3 References. ¶ As early as the 1800s, there were complaints that administrative bureaucracy hampered schools in their efforts to provide effective instruction. A historical review shows that efforts to suppress bureaucracy in the schools of the Swiss canton of Zurich culminated in the 1970s with the uncoupling of administrative control. A somewhat chaotic period ensued. Close examination of the formulation & effects of the school code reveals the structures & performances used by participants to coordinate their actions. Ironically, problems of cooperation are solved by reproducing a recognizable structure, in stark contrast to theories advocating chaos. The solution to any problem comes from the participants & not from the structure, as predicted by bureaucratic advocates. Mutual interests provide the basis of the solution, whose realization depends on their compatibility & careful exposition. 20 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Data obtained via several self-report measures are drawn on to compare the academic motivations of university students in Manila, the Philippines, & Minn (N = 920 & 925, respectively). Results indicate that approval & self-improvement ranked higher for Filipino students, & motives involving performance standards ranked higher for US students Gender differences were also apparent in both cultures–men reported more assertive & competitive achievment modes, & women, stronger motives regarding performance standards–demonstrating generalizable socialization differences for achievement. Intrinsic task motives were closely tied to affiliation & self-improvement motives for Filipino, but not US, students, suggesting that achieving & affiliating motives may be less distinct in the Philippine setting than implied by Western theory 5 Tables, 49 References. ¶ Following a review of the literature demonstrating inequality in US education & its social ramifications, based primarily on the thesis of Samuel Bowles & Herbert Gintis (Schooling and Capitalist America, New York: Basic Books, 1976), an attempt is made to move beyond this established relationship to explore its social acceptance. The legitimation of inequality is viewed primarily as a product of early stratification in education & its cumulative reinforcement, in a cultural context of contests as an equality of opportunity. 31 References. Response, 149-154.

¶ An analysis of Peter Foster's Policy and Practice in Multicultural and Anti-Racist Education (London: Routledge, 1990) critiques the research methodology & questions the study's findings. Foster claimed that there were no instances of racism (direct or indirect) in an inner-city, multiethnic high school, & he supported the pathological & cultural inferiority argument that black children have comparatively poorer educational attainment & greater disadvantages because they attend low achieving schools. It is suggested that Foster's theoretical model of Weberian political sociology linking an ethical stance with certain research methods ignored the contradictory/conflictual relations between dominant & subordinate social actors. In What Are Connolly's Rules? A Reply to Paul Connolly, Foster (Crewe & Alsager Coll of Higher Education, Cheshire ST7 2HL, UK) rejects his critique as ill-informed & unconvincing. Although agreeing that a person's political stance can influence research methods, Foster insists on his objectivity & defends his conception of multicultural & antiracist education. Foster also notes that his empirical evidence has not been refuted. 1 Figure, 26 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A comparison of the divergent responses of NY & Va to the major anti-school prayer cases of the US Supreme Court since WWII. Reactions among politicians, editors, clergy, & educators are examined, concluding that such key variables as public attitudes about the law & the federal judicial system, the degree of religious pluralism, & the extent of central vs local control of education on the state level affected the course that each state pursued when confronted with unpopular decisions. In NY, school prayer was ousted rather quickly; on the other hand, ways were found in Va to maintain school prayer for decades in many communities. Modified AA

¶ It is argued that the idea of school choice was reborn in the 1980s due both to renewed interest among conservatives & to unprecedented changes in sentiment toward public schooling among liberal policy scholars, urban educators, black parents, & state governors. However, this heterogeneous political base also makes the successful movement for school choice vulnerable to reversal. To analyze the sources of the movement, the "state relative automony" theory of political power & the "garbage can" theory of organizational decision making are employed. 94 References. ¶ Jacqueline Gautherin introduces this previously unpublished manuscript dating from early 1910, which provides a retrospective of the approximately thirty years after ethics was introduced into the primary-level curriculum of the public (secular) school. The central issue is how ethics should be taught without referring to any religious system or rational theology, given that conventional philosophic & metaphysical analyses are beyond the grasp of children. After general observations about popular conceptions of ethics, it is argued that societal rules determine limits to the morality of certain actions. Moral objectives should supersede other objectives. Religion teaches that moral laws are linked to the divinity. To understand the concept of a godless higher authority, an analogy is drawn between society & its members & God & His faithful. A source of beneficient & judgmental legislative power, society & social interaction determine the human spirit. To teach ethics in school is to demonstrate its real-world significance. J. Sadler

Findings reveal that since the 1970s, TUs in both countries have been demanding more say in educational policy reforms. For their part, governments in both countries show a great openness toward TU demands, stemming from a liberal-societal corporatism point of view. However, French TUs are more politically oriented; their interest in being involved in the educational reform process stems from their active involvement in French politics in general. The Israeli TUs are much less involved in Israeli politics; their wish to be involved in the educational reform process stems more from professional concerns. 32 References. (GER)

¶ There is a communication deficit between the universities & the Austrian public due to: (1) the misuse of science for political reasons in recent decades; (2) an attitude by academicians that journalists are not competent at communicating scientific ideas; & (3) an attitude by journalists that the public is disinterested in science. To investigate reasons underlying these attitudes, questionnaire data were obtained from a nationally representative sample of 1,000 adults concerning their opinions of scientific research at the U of Vienna. Additionally, a content analysis was performed on 1,165 science articles published in Austrian magazines & newspapers, 1989/90. About 43% of the respondents thought that the university played a key role in solving pressing social problems. About 57% of the scientific articles appeared in the newspapers Presse & Standard. The attention paid to the university by the press is disproportionately large in comparison to its research output. It is concluded that universities sould address communication shortcomings by developing a communication-oriented self-explication of teaching & research; modern marketing or public relations strategies may need to be employed to this end. 7 Tables, 4 Graphs. ¶ In a report on trends in PhD studies in social work (SW) programs & PhD candidates 1981-1988, it is shown that while there are many new PhD programs, few students apply & fewer enter teaching. There is concern among SW educators that, in the near future, PhDs on the faculty of major universities will be in short supply, with fewer qualified staff to meet the educational needs of burgeoning graduate & undergraduate social work programs. Analyzing the applications, enrollment, & graduation statistics gathered from an annual survey of programs (Group for the Advancement of Doctoral Education), & from the National Science Foundation's annual reports on all US university PhDs, it is noted that federal financial aid has been cut sharply, & that debt related to educational costs continues to mount. In addition, the number of African-American PhD students has declined over the previous decade, while the number of women & foreign applicants has increased. 5 Tables, 5 References. J. ¶ Questionnaire data obtained from 64 directors of the 99 Council on Social Work Education-accredited Master of Social Work (MSW) programs in the US indicate use of a variety of evaluation methods to assess learning outcomes, but the majority of MSW programs are evaluated solely on a course-by-course basis, rather than on a comprehensive measure of student competence. Kurzwell, Edith (c/o Partisan Review–Boston U, MA 02215), Multiculturalism Abroad, UM Partisan Review, 1992, 59, 3, summer, 420-427.

¶ Outside the US, the term multiculturalism does not define a leftist or African-American agenda, but encompasses the problems of integrating ethnic & religious groups/sects that have legitimate claims on the same territory; further, diversity is not postulated by the "politically correct" as multiculturalism's rhetorical twin, but as the necessary process of learning to hold an ongoing, peaceful dialogue with the "other"–based on mutual acceptance & respect. Participants from many countries to the Ecumenical Instit (Tantur, Jerusalem, Israel) noted that "tolerance cannot be institutionalized or imposed by one side"; rather, Israel must achieve a nonutopian, rational society in which Christians, Arabs, & Jews can tolerate one another & coexist. When nationalism & religious differences overlap, outsiders assume the clash is over territory, while insiders argue over the patrimony of the land, over endemic factors. Such conflict cannot be resolved, but must be managed; over time, feelings for territory become stronger. Whether in Germany, Ireland, Israel, or the former Soviet satellites, conflicts always come down to enforcing the rights of minorities, nurturing community spirit, & establishing intrinsic, authentic mutuality. In a concluding interview, Teddy Kollek, the legendary mayor of Jerusalem, offers his views on some of these issues. Modified AA

Assessed here is the extent to which expertise in administrative problem solving can be taught to practicing administrators. ¶ From the epistemological perspective, education is a modality & a concretization of the formative space in which forms of reason, knowledge, & learning are developed. As a primordial element of the space, education sustains specific mechanisms of reproduction & expansion of the social dynamic. The problem of reformulating the educational space must be done from the perspective of a concrete subject with a particular vision of the world & particular day-to-day practices, which implies that the visions & practices of this space must be known. ¶ In an examination of the reciprocal relationships between academic achievement & general self-esteem, data from questionnaires & school records for 315 students in grades 7-12 in 1986 in a private, independent coeducational preparatory school in a large southwestern US city suggest that academic self-concept & perceptions of teachers directly influence general self-esteem. Results confirm the hypothesis that general self-esteem both influences & is influenced by academic achievement. Moreover, self-esteem is not passive, but actively influences behavior & mechanisms that individuals adopt in coping with their world. Educators & policymakers are encouraged to structure school curricula to facilitate the achievement of both skill development & self-enhancement as goals of education. 2 Tables, 3 Figures, 1 Appendix, 43 References. ¶ Given the lack of democratic process, deterioration of interpersonal relations, & conflicts within teams in social service agencies that serve the popular sector, it is proposed that empowerment concepts & principles from popular education may be utilized to return to employees the concept of social good. Such a model was used with health workers (N not provided) in 1990 & evaluated via questionnaire. The elements of popular education used are outlined. This experiment constituted psychosociological intervention in that it promoted employee participation & took into account the sociopolitical context. 12 References. J. Taylor

¶ An exploration of the function(s) of mentoring in initial teacher training (ITT) in England. The role of mentors in nursing, social services, academics, & business is outlined, & two contrasting roles are isolated: the pastoral, concerned with fostering personal development; & the professional, concerned with more formal procedures, eg, assessment. Mentoring should not necessarily conform to either of these, but rather, be determined by the terms of reference of the situation in which the mentor & protégé function. The term "contract mentor" is coined to describe the short-term contractual form of modern mentoring, & the practice considered in relation to ITT. After comparing ITT & induction in the US & England, changes in the latter's teacher education are described, & it is concluded that ITT mentoring is in a state of confusion. The options for partnership between mentors in schools & tutors in ITT establishments are addressed. It is concluded that a mentor can legitimately take a number of contrasting forms, but that the terms of reference must be clear to all parties involved. 46 References. ¶ In a discussion of resources necessary for achieving & maintaining high quality PhD-level social work (SW) education, it is acknowledged that no reasonable expense should be spared, nor any support of the university's resources denied, in providing a superior education. Resources are defined as an extensive, varied, & scholarly teaching staff, practical experience opportunities in both teaching & research, funding to supplement growing student costs, an intelligent choice in teaching programs, motivated & smart students, & a responsive academic infrastructure. The cost of implementing a PhD program should be carefully balanced against other essential expenses, without overlooking the intangible intellectual benefits that such a program & its candidates impart to SW faculty & students. It is noted that an increase in PhD programs will not solve the shortage of PhD recipients, & that new PhD programs will be valueless without sufficient resources. 17 References. J. ¶ In 1967, long-standing tuition fees for secondary education in Ireland were removed, & other forms implemented. In an examination of whether social class (SC) differences in secondary school decreased & enrollments increased when the financial burden lessened, changes in the effect of SC on educational transitions are analyzed for the birth cohorts 1908-1956 via data from the 1973/74 Irish Mobility Study (N = 2,269 men) & the Drumcondra Study of Educational Achievement (N = 500 students born 1956). Results lead to the hypothesis of "maximally maintained inequality," in that overall SC differences in educational attainment declined, but SC barriers were not removed. An investigation of actual economic incentives in 1967 suggests why the removal of tuition fees did little for educational equality & what kinds of alternative policies might have had a greater effect. 5 Tables, 4 Figures, 36 References. ¶ It is contended that less ambiguous organization constructs than the continuum between generalist & specialist are needed for baccalaureate & master's programs in social work. Instead of a continuum, it is suggested that the two programs be conceived as independent entities. The baccalaureate degree should train case managers in public service agencies, & the master's degree prepare graduates with specific skills & knowledge for genuinely advanced practice. This formulation calls into question the notion of a common professional foundation & eliminates the practice of granting advanced standing. 2 Tables, 19 References. Adapted from the source document. Arguments against the further bureaucratization of AA programs in Paul Piccone's "The Crisis of American Conservatism" (see SA 41:1/93Z5179) are critically assessed, & examples from the U of California's AA policies are drawn on to defend minority hiring policies & to vitiate Piccone's artificial negativity thesis. In Artificial Negativity as a Bureaucratic Tool? ¶ Schools are a special type of social organization, characterized by: (1) an explicit goal of imparting knowledge; (2) the limited applicability of technology; (3) teacher-student interaction; (4) the teacher as a semiprofessional lacking control; (5) the unique division of labor where teachers interact with their students but only to a limited extent with each other; & (6) self-reflection on goals. A graphic profile is developed showing how schools differ from other organizations, eg, hospitals, factories, & churches. Individual schools need to concentrate on their ability to organize & learn as an institution. Local school systems must also develop organizational expertise. It is argued that the problem facing the nation is not how to educate the best students better, but how to cope with the needs of the rest. The only way to prevent a two-tier private-public system is through substantial investment in public education, as is done at the university level. It is concluded that these considerations do not negate choice, but do point to the need to create meaningful choices for individuals at all preparation, ability, & socioeconomic levels. L. Dorn

¶ The critical sociology of education, specifically, the extent to which schools are autonomous from the larger society, guides an evaluation of 3 different types of intervention programs: drug abuse prevention, sex education, & programs to change gender stereotypes. Secondary empirical data indicate that all have limited effectiveness. Schools appear unable to change culturally prevalent behaviors because they themselves are strongly influenced by that culture, & because adolescents are influenced by forces outside school. It is suggested that to be effective, such interventions will require governmental agencies, community groups, & the media to work with the schools in order to influence the culture & thus produce individual behavioral changes. 47 References. ¶ The formation of scientists at the undergraduate & graduate levels, whether in the natural or social sciences, is judged to be of poor quality. Seeking to improve the formation of university science students, the logic & function of didactic discourses are analyzed, along with the epistemological problem of the apprehension of reality in the construction of knowledge mediating that formation. ¶ The concept of a sponsored school system in the People's Republic of China refers to a form of social mobility under which elite recruits are chosen by the established elite, & elite status is given on the basis of loyalty to Chinese communism. This system contrasts the contest system in which elite status is achieved by the aspirants' own efforts. In an examination of why China's educational system is & will remain a sponsored one, it is demonstrated how the political institution of China affects the form of its educational institutions. Three historical stages in China's educational system under communism are traced, culminating in the formation of a new sponsored system following the 1989 Tiananmen Square student movement. It is concluded that dropping the class-line policy & adopting academic performance as the selection criterion for education in China would signal the end of the sponsored system. 1 Table, 29 References. ¶ Because of the need in Latin America for people who can transform the current reality in conformance with principles of justice, democracy, & sovereignty, the formation of critical & creative citizens is of paramount importance. Education is, of course, one of the means to develop such citizens, because education is capable of establishing a relationship between knowledge & reality, & thereby, the means to transform reality. The possibilities & limitations that combine to create a critical & creative perspective in a person in an exceptional situation–war & extraordinary circumstances short of war–are discussed. It is assumed that: (1) for people to transform reality, the political plane is repositioned in the epistemological plane; (2) if the possibilities for transformation are governed by the relationship of knowledge-subject-reality, then everyday knowledge can either contribute to or detract from these possibilities; & (3) one of the ways in which knowledge generated from daily life can contribute to social transformation is located in the forms of the relationship established between the individual & education. ¶ Higher education is concerned with providing a means of gainful employment to students, but paradoxically, because of the economic crisis in Mexico, higher education is unable even to provide gainful employment to its own personnel. Contrary to the stereotype that academics prefer work inside the ivory tower, 1986 survey data on labor diversification for 13,517 U Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM) personnel showed that 55% of the academic staff participated in remunerative activities outside of UNAM. Teaching professors had a greater tendency to be employed outside the university than did research professors; socioeconomic factors, eg, spousal employment, degree of professionalization (seniority), & administrative duties, also played a role. In comparison to findings of a 1981-1983 survey at UNAM, external job-holding among the professional staff has increased. This labor diversification among academics is increasing at the same time that public functionaries & businesspeople are seeking positions inside the university. ¶ A discussion of the integration of theory & practice (ITP) loop, a major objective of professional social work (SW) education. In reality, however, SW students frequently experience discontinuity between classroom & practicum. Many concepts learned in the classroom seem difficult to apply & even appear irrelevant to learning practice skills. A teaching model that meets the goals of ITP, & that can be presented in both the classroom & the field, is described that is relevant to both micro & macro settings, & across diverse practice situations. 1 Figure, 14 References. ¶ The rapid expansion of the world economy following WWII has been paralleled by the growth of a transnational culture. Here, considered are implications of transnationalism for the role of language in cultural interaction, using the illustrative case of Columbia Academy, an international school in the Kobe/Osaka area of Japan. It is contended that language mediates interpersonal dynamics at the school & is the vehicle for other forms of cultural expression. The terms "transnationals" & "transculturals" are used to refer to people with a high degree of acculturation in the international world. The fact that people feel confident in attempting to communicate cross-culturally through language, it is argued, presupposes universally shared meanings. It is concluded that the recognition of a plurality of cultures at Columbia Academy is encouraging as societies are redefined in light of a world society. 57 References. L. Findings reveal an inverse relationship between prestige offered by sociology departments & the extent of faculty role integration. It is contended that the poor job market for new PhDs accounts for the "trickling down" of role integration to less renowned sociology departments. Recommendations & predictions regarding the possibility of sociology faculty regaining control over their work are offered. 2 Tables, 36 References. W. ¶ In reviewing the trends in current Canadian PhD programs in social work (SW) education (N = 23 schools, listed in the Canadian Assoc of Schools of Social Work directory), it is found that debates & issues are not significantly different from those in the US: the necessity of quality

After a sketch of the development of PhD-level SW education, other problems are identified: the need for explicit & consensual educational program objectives, & the establishment of policy & procedures for both the graduate school & the SW school. 15 References. Discussing problems of education from an epistemological perspective implies a determination of how the reality in which knowledge is formulated structures its contents. This determination includes consideration of the logical/epistemological axis, which is related to psychocognitive processes; contexts that serve to obstruct or facilitate innovations that can arise in the school, educational system, etc; & the body of propositions contained in educational policy. Such a program of epistemological investigation is now being developed at the Center of Sociological Studies in the Colegio de México. M. Pflum

¶ In No!, arguing against the role for clinical doctoral education, Barbara K. Shore (School of Social Work, U of Pittsburgh, Pa) identifies three models of the primary objective of doctoral education in social work: the research doctorate, a practice/scholar program, & combined programs that offer a mix of research, practice, & teaching emphasis. It is suggested that programs that prepare practitioners for specific tasks in a private practice model, & do not focus on the broader social welfare system & its services to the disadvantaged population, dilute the role of social work. Citing the changing university climate, which places increased emphasis on research for appointment, tenure, promotion, & funding, an argument is put forth against doctoral programs not rooted in a university or a social work program. In Yes!, favoring clinical doctoral education, Arnold M. Levin (Instit for Clinical Social Work, Chicago, Ill) cites his personal experience to encourage progress in advanced clinical social work education, rather than obstructing its evolution. The need for additional training beyond the master's degree, the importance of titles in professional acceptance, & the career satisfaction obtained through doctoral-level education are emphasized. ¶ To investigate the Aquarian religious communities in Italy's Piedmontese region, interview data were obtained in 1990-1992 from residents (N not given) of Villagio Verde & Damanhur. These villages, founded in 1982 & 1975, respectively, had their origin in an apocalyptical religious movement, which began in 1968, seeking to achieve a new type of spiritually therapeutic knowledge & absolute alternative in the social realm. Four sequential phases can be identified in the construction of these communities: (1) the establishment of a diffuse sense of risk & inquietude; (2) the realization of a new alliance between man & nature; (3) the establishment of new communities; & (4) the need for an apocalyptic event to rupture their ties with the world at large. ¶ The residents of Brazilian peripheral areas have ambiguous & inferior social status. Yet, despite their marginalized position, mediums in these areas are able to acquire a respectable status among their believers & neutralize social & religious stigmatization. ¶ In the US, Catholicism: is treated as a sect in a predominately Protestant country; is effectively a competing denomination, one of the country's largest; comprises multiple ethnic allegiances & territorial nationalities; & in an ecclesio-logical dimension, balances a chauvinistic identification as the most American denomination with absolute allegiance to the Roman Catholic church. A pre-1928 review of anti-Catholicist & evangelical Protestant nativist movements is followed by a discussion of the emergence of a public Catholicism style, distinguishable from immigrant & liberal republican styles. Conflicts between a multinational & a US national church, between authoritarian & participatory agenda in church decision making, between episcopal sovereignty & a centralized structure, all have surfaced in the history of US Catholicism. After describing the Hausa Bori & its spirit pantheon, the role ascribed to spirits in two historical events–the Ader famine in 1970 & the Kurfey peasant revolt in 1926–is analyzed, demonstrating how the cult matrix was used to interpret events as part of a sociopolitical scheme, & to incite rebellious actions. ¶ The relationships between religiosity & interpersonal friendliness & cooperation are examined, using data from the 1979/80 National Survey of Black Americans ([NSBA] N = 2,107). Post-hoc ratings by NSBA interviewers (N not specified) indicate that respondents (Rs) who engaged in frequent devotional activities (eg, prayer, Bible study) were more open, less suspicious, & more enjoyable to interview than were their less-religious counterparts. In addition, Rs for whom religion was an important source of moral guidance were also viewed as friendlier, more interested, & more open than those for whom this aspect of religion was less salient. Other aspects of R religiosity (eg, church participation) were unrelated to interviewer assessments. Findings are discussed in terms of religious role-taking processes & the internalization of religious norms concerning interpersonal kindness & empathy, although several alternative explanations are also considered. Implications & directions for future research are identified. 1 Table, 76 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Previous research has demonstrated that conservative Protestants disproportionately support the use of corporal punishment. Here, it is suggested that this reflects the impact of three components of religious ideology: (1) the acceptance of the doctrine of biblical literalism; (2) the conviction that human nature (& hence the nature of young children) is inherently sinful; & (3) the belief that human sin demands punishment. These arguments about the religious roots of support for corporal punishment are evaluated using data from the 1988 General Social Survey (N = 988 respondents). Ordinary least squares regression & structural equation models generally confirm the theoretical model, & invite further research on how religious factors affect parental values & practices. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 85 References. ¶ A questionnaire containing a values survey was used to explore terminal & institutional value differences among expatriate Iranian Baha'is residing in Australia, native Australian Baha'is, & unselected Australians (total N = 160). Results showed that the 2 Baha'i groups rated values concerned with restrictive conformity, tradition, & spirituality as relatively more important, & values concerned with hedonism, self-direction, & stimulation as relatively less important, compared to the unselected Australians. Other group differences in value priorities were also obtained when groups were compared two at a time. ¶ Two major assumptions of Roger Bastide on Afro-Brazilian religions (The African Religions of Brazil, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1978 [1960]) are questioned here: (1) the incoherence of Quimbanda & Macumba magic, & (2) the discontinuity between Umbanda & Quimbanda magic. To counter Bastide's characterization of Umbanda/Quimbanda magic as a "jumble of objects & rites," analyzed are popular writings of Umbandist & Quimbandist mediums circulating since the 1940s. ¶ Some scholars use the category of millenarism to describe almost any vision of immanent apocalypse, while others use it only for sects prophesying the establishment of a new order that will last exactly 1,000 years. In English, the three words "millenarism," "millennialism," & "millenarianism" are sometimes used to express the distinctions between various groups. Examples of millenarist groups are identified from pagan & Christian antiquity up to the present. Currently, a postmillenarism is developing that emphasizes the inauguration on earth of a new law as an immanent & necessary hisorical development. ¶ Three foundational types of social exchange were identified by Claude Lévi-Strauss: exchange of words, goods, & people. It is suggested here that the three monastic vows–obedience, poverty, & chastity–are an inversion of these rules. This refusal to exchange by a group makes it an antisociety. The three rules of both society & antisociety correspond to three basic codes: grammatical, juridical, & moral. The history of recurrent reform attempts in Western monasticism, especially in the Middle Ages, should be interpreted as an unresolved struggle between the refusal to live in society, & the plain understanding of the impossibility of this task. The struggle may be connected to the psychoanalytical process of negation & denial. 34 References. Adapted from the source document. (ARA)

¶ Martyrdom emerges in a political conflict between two, usually unequally matched, societies as a political act aimed at reallocating power between the societies. Each of the contending societies struggles to control the meaning of the act, defined by the dominant society as an act of terror or madness, & by the subordinate society as an act of heroism. Social leaders, altruistically motivated, tend to be recruited to the role & are often trained in its performance. The dominant society has an interest in repressing martyrdom either by suppressing its public face or by imposing an unacceptable price on the subordinate society. A type of antimartyr may emerge in the form of a member of an oppressed society who identifies with the oppressor out of what he or she considers the best interests of the oppressed. 16 References. Lanternari, Vittorio, Quante apocalissi d'ogni secolo e d'oggi (How Many Apocalypses of Other Eras and Today), UM La Critica Sociologica, 1992, 102, Apr-July, 1-12. (ITA)

¶ An analysis is presented of apocalyptic visions of history from medieval to modern times, emphasizing the roles of prophet-interpreters & promoter-planners. Attention is focused on new religious movements in Latin American & other Third World regions. Pentecostalist groups, eg, the Assembly of God in Brazil, & Afro-American religions, eg, Rastafarianism, arose due to special historical circumstances & intercultural contacts. Such movements tend to emphasize the movement away from outward observances toward inward spiritual development. Apocalyptic visions result from the discovery of evil operating at deep levels within the world & from the hopeful expectation of the destruction of the evil order & the restoration of moral justice & salvation. Thus, the apocalypse is seen as the end of the old order & the prefiguration of a new order, & therefore inspires both fear & hope. 4 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Life satisfaction in 560 second-generation adults in 9 religious Israeli kibbutzim was measured using a 26-item scale based on a universal model of satisfaction. Overall, satisfaction with kibbutz life was average to high. With other variables controlled in regression analysis, males (Ms) & those for whom religion played a central role were more satisfied than females (Fs) & those for whom religion was not central. Family, physical environment, & standard of living were identified as the domains of highest satisfaction. Kibbutz values & the religious domain were mid-ranked for satisfaction, followed by leisure activities & freedom/independence. Kibbutz members were the least satisfied with the ability of the kibbutz to realize general social goals. In the younger age groups & among Ms, satisfaction with the work domain had a stronger influence on overall satisfaction than for older age groups & Fs. The domains of freedom/independence & the family had the strongest influences on overall satisfaction with kibbutz life, meaning that kibbutz members were most concerned with how the kibbutz functions as a "home" for themselves & their family, & the amount of freedom given them in this home. This finding represents a somewhat individualistic concern for these second-generation kibbutzim members. 3 Tables, 1 Appendix, 31 References. M. ¶ An overview of the historical development of preadamite theory (ie, the idea that human beings existed before the biblical Adam) is offered to show how it facilitated the interpenetration of scientific & religious discourses via harmonizing strategies. The early history of preadamism is explored, & its relation to paganism is discussed. It is shown how preadamism's early deployment as a source of skeptical biblical criticism led to its adoption by supporters of racial ideology to justify white theodicy from both poly- & monogenetic perspectives. Also, the ways that preadamism met challenges from evolutionary theory are examined, as is the way in which the theory functioned to keep the peace between science & religion. It is concluded that preadamism bridged the conceptual gulf separating science & religion by interrogating both scientific theory & theological conviction. 9 Graphs. W. ¶ In Brazil's Xango cult, each devotee has an individual principal god in charge of all aspects of the devotee's life. The Xango priest nominates the individual's principal god in a ritual of god-attribution, centered on the devotee's trance. Describing the ritual in detail, it is demonstrated how the priest consciously manipulates the nomination ritual, which leads to nomination of a god that seems appropriate for the personality of the initiated. ¶ While Shinto religious practices would seem a likely candidate for extinction within Japan's high-technology consumer society, it is commonplace that new cars be blessed at a shrine, that new residences, offices, or factories be built after exorcism ceremonies purify & calm the land & its deity, that children are dedicated there, & that governmental functions frequently invite ritualistic encapsulation that shapes & orders the consciousness of those involved, often in nationalistic directions. Here, it is considered why this animistically inspired system of ritual practices, structured around hazy notions of "chaos" & "order," remain viable in Japan for both the common person as well as for elites. 51 References. In his era, the population supported itself through hunting, fishing, food gathering, & agriculture. Leisure time was spent in the hills or at the beach. There existed deep beliefs in magic & religion. The way of life was inseparable from the diversions & beliefs, in contrast to what Marcel Mauss & Emile Durkheim reported about the Eskimos or Australian Aboriginals. ¶ To investigate trends in how leaders of Eastern religious movements in Italy are dealing with ecological issues, interview data were obtained 1982-1990 from members (N not given) of the Rajneeshpuram & Hare Krishna sects in Italy. The Eastern religions provide a new supply of linguistic & symbolic means to interpret environmental issues. Some groups proceed from the recognition of environmental catastrophe to an apocalyptic religious vision & then to calls for radical action, while others sense that damage to mother earth resulted from alienation from the totality through which everyone & everything must be recycled, & therefore propose a return to simple monastic & agrarian lifestyles. The appearance of such movements signals the mobilization of critical consciousness on a mass level, viewing the present negative situation as clearly unsustainable. 3 Tables, 12 References. M. ¶ A review essay on a book by Thomas Luckmann, Die unsichtbare Religion ([The Invisible Religion] Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1991 see listing in IRPS No. 68]). After a brief review of Luckmann's previous works, attention is focused on his thesis that organized religion is but one of many possible forms that religiosity may assume. Thus, the sociology of religion is emancipated from the sociology of churches. Special attention is given to his treatment of: our relationship to the transcendental; differences between his approach & those of Max Weber & Emile Durkheim; the effects of deinstitutionalization on the churches; the difference between belief by, vs of, an individual; & the weakening of symbols & rituals corresponding to a weakening of dogmas & articles of faith. The privatization of religion & syncretism are two related phenomena of the same social structure; pluralism no longer describes the different cosmological visions of society. M. ¶ Data from 5 standardized scales are used to compare university students from Helsinki, Finland & the southern US (total N = 468) in terms of: (1) paranormal beliefs; (2) personality adjustment constructs–alienation, anomie, death concerns, & death threat; & (3) relationships between these variables. Analysis demonstrates that US respondents (Rs) report significantly greater belief in traditional religious belief, superstition, witchcraft, & extraordinary life forms. Finnish Rs report significantly greater death concerns & death threat, whereas US Rs report significantly greater anomie. Paranormal beliefs show stronger relationships with measures of personality adjustment for the Finns than for the US Rs. There were 13 significant relationships between paranormal belief subscales & measures of personality adjustment among the Finns, & only 5 for the US Rs. Findings are consistent with the notion that secularization has advanced further in Finland than in the US. 3 Tables, 31 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Anne-Marie De Bruycker, in "Christendom en Milieu" ((Christianity and the Environment) see SA 40:5/92Z2910), maintained that Christianity strongly influenced negative Western attitudes toward nature & that the environment was always seen as an enemy having to be subdued or destroyed, while in primitive societies nature was seen as an ally with which people lived in symbiosis. It is argued that De Bruycker used antiquated, imprecise vocabulary to describe non-Western societies, revealing a low level of anthropological knowledge. Non-Western peoples do not live in a cultural vacuum focused on nature; every culture has at least some impact on the ecology. Primitive cultures also change their environment, even if the scale of the change is small compared with industrial civilization. White non-Western philosophies can help the West discover a new dynamics in the relationship between culture & the environment, it would be ludicrous to think that primitive societies live as noble savages in a luxuriant natural environment. 1 Table, 24 References. ----, A Symposium on the Catholic Ethic and the Spirit of Socio-Economic Justice, International Journal of Politics, Culture and Society, 1992, 6, 2, winter, 299-329.

¶ A symposium format is used to explore social justice in Catholic ethical thought through a review of George E. McCarthy's & Royal W. Rhodes's Eclipse of Justice: Ethics, Economics and the Lost Traditions of American Catholicism (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1992), which examines a pastoral letter (Economic Justice for All) on the US economy issued by the Catholic Bishops of the US in 1986. In The Bishops' Letter Revisited, Arthur F. McGovern, S. J., (U of Detroit, Mich) lauds the book's detailed structural analysis of several evils in the US economic system, & its attention to the weaknesses of the letter in respect to US economic relations with developing countries. McGovern, however, criticizes the apparent blanket rejection of market economics, free enterprise, & arguments used to justify the capitalist system. In Marx Slowly Makes It to the Sanctuary but Not the Baptismal Font, James R. Kelly (Fordham U, Bronx, NY) takes issue with the book's claim that the failure of the letter to overcome liberal discourse & practices reveals the inadequacy of their trenchant reformist critique of US society. Kelly also challenges the book's main aim–to reveal the superior critical resources of liberation theology that combines Marxist ideas with the eclipsed voices of Old Testament prophets & the monastic spirituality of pacifism & voluntary poverty. In Whose Justice and Justice for What Purpose?: A Catholic Neo-Orthodox Critique, Joseph A. Varacalli (Nassau Community Coll, Garden City, NY) criticizes the authors for implicitly equating the Catholic neoconservative movement with Catholic conservatism, & for claiming that an explicit Marxist analysis of political economy should be substituted for the implicit procapitalist analysis employed in the letter. In Catholic Ethics and Social Justice: Natural Law and Beyond José Casanova (New School for Social Research, New York, NY) argues against the authors that the needed institutional mediation between ethical principles & policy recommendations cannot be found in Marxian social science. Casanova also criticizes their claim that liberation theology is the most radical & valid form of Catholic social thought. 17 References. W. Howard

¶ The recent proliferation of feminist legal theory has contributed significantly to the demystification of the law & legal practice. Here, three implicit themes in much feminist jurisprudence are identified that raise central issues about the conceptions of women & law: (1) to argue that women possess special, distinctive, & sometimes superior qualities (whether biologically or socially derived) can lead to an essentialist position whereby "real" women are denied other characteristics; (2) the emphasis on differences between men & women glosses over complex ethnic, class, regional, & age differentials among women; & (3) the view that society & the law are patriarchal often renders women passive victims & devalues their historical achievements & resistances to absolute domination. Suggestions about how these issues might be resolved are offered to provide a critique of the law & legal practice by taking into account the social & political context in which men & women are located. ¶ To assess the validity of two propositions on white-collar (W-C) crime proposed by Michael R. Gottfredson & Travis Hirschi (A General Theory of Crime (see IRPS No. 57/91c01395)), which predicts that W-C offenders are (1) as criminally versatile & (2) as prone to deviance as common offenders, criminal records of 2,462 W-C & 1,986 common offenders & their respective levels of participation in deviant activities are compared. As the general theory predicts, some W-C offenders are involved in crime & deviance to much the same degree as typical street criminals, but a large majority differ significantly, contradicting the theory & limiting its generalizability. It is argued that the theory's rejection of motives as important causal forces is misguided, & that a more complex causal structure is needed to account for patterns of W-C offending. 5 Tables, 2 Appendixes, 44 References. ¶ It is contended that US Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is using a particular form of decisional analysis, labeled "reductionist conservatism" (RC) to address the various legal questions that come before the court. RC is characterized by a fact-based, case-by-case analysis of competing claims, usually deciding for the favored party in a case. RC depends on contextual reasoning & avoids rigid ideological standards to resolve cases. To support this contention, Leading Case statistics are cited from the Harvard Law Review, & doctrinal analysis is employed to assess O'Connor's opinions in two significant legal areas: abortion & establishment clause cases. Analysis demonstrates that O'Connor exhibits a marked tendency to join the majority side in 5-4 decisions, & avoids a strict conservative ideology standard. Her judicial independence is also reflected in her development of the "undue burdens" test for abortion cases, & her articulation of the "endorsement" test in establishment clause cases. It is concluded that O'Connor employs RC to exert considerable influence on an ideologically muddled Supreme Court. 2 Tables, 15 References. ¶ While the plea of duress is generally accepted as a defense against criminal prosecution, the reasons why it exonerates are subject to dispute & disagreement. Duress is not easily recognizable as either an excusing or justifying condition, nor is duress generally permitted as a defense against criminal homicide, though some US jurisdictions allow the defense in felony-murder cases. Here, an argument is presented for how & why the presence of duress can defeat a finding of criminal responsibility. The discussion is intended to establish the philosophical foundation for the legal acceptability of the duress defense, even though it is concluded that the defense does not qualify as either an excuse or a justification. Also, it is argued that the duress defense should be allowed in cases of homicide. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ The Continental Congress, 1783-1787, devoted considerable attention to establishing a framework of government for the new American nation's western domain. The jurisprudential provisions of two Western ordinances that the Congress adopted–dealing with who would be lawmakers, the sources of law, & the nature of lawmaking in the western territories–are described, based on analysis of the ordinances & related congressional records, & late colonial & revolutionary literature. The first Ordinance of 1784, provided for an informal, unwritten, & discretionary justice rooted in popular legislation & institutions of indigenous community; but it was replaced in 1787 by the famous Northwest Ordinance, which established a more formalized, professional, & centralized legal order separated from community. In both the conflict between community justice & formal law, & their lack of a final resolution, the Western ordinances help to illuminate the nature of revolutionary discourse concerning jurisprudence. ¶ A consideration of the problem of nationalism as expressed through law. The general problem of defining nation within the context of the international legal system is explored, arguing that the traditional postwar categories of "people" & "minority" are ultimately meaningless, because they describe the power status of the group, rather than identifying the group by objective criteria. A nation, in the political sense, may be seen within international law as either a people or a minority, & may change its status over time; the province of Quebec is offered as an example. Legislation is characterized as the discourse of the empowered nation or people, while litigation, particularly that which challenges the legitimacy of legislation, is the discourse of the powerless nation or minority. The example of Quebec's language legislation since 1977 is used to demonstrate this phenomenon. Several landmark cases are discussed in detail, demonstrating how the decisions in the majority of these have recognized, to a limited extent, the right of existence of the Anglo-Quebec minority as a legitimate collectivity. The question of coexistence is raised, & it is tentatively proposed that all collectivities be recognized as valuable, & that the univocal emphasis of nationalism be replaced by an approach of multiple perspectives, which does not automatically privilege any particular viewpoint. In the context of the Quebec situation, this may mean the application of Canada's "two nations" theory to the province itself. Modified AA

¶ Personal experience in establishing an interdisciplinary exchange in the U of Namur, Belgium, between the departments of sociology & law prompted an investigation of the appropriate epistemology for such exchange, with the goal of eventually elaborating a "science of law." It is suggested that the intellectualist conception of science renders difficult any interdisciplinary dialogue. An exploration of subjectivity as an instrument to reach truth in human sciences may serve as an effective tool for interdisciplinary rapproachement. The impasse created by dogmatism in sociology & law is described, & elements for a lucid dialogue are proposed. It is emphasized that interdisciplinarity should rest on the recognition that scientific practice needs to be open to imagination, effervescence, unpredictability, & invention. 33 References. To test the effects of blindfolding on jury decisions, 1,022 juriors in Cook County (Ill) were shown 12 versions of a simulated videotaped antitrust price-fixing case & given 6 sets of judicial instructions. Consistent with a picture of the jury as active rather than passive, it is found that jurors are more likely to follow judicial instructions when they are given explanations rather than bald admonitions. In addition, complex expert testimony neither overpowers the jurors nor is dismissed by them. The expert presenting a statistical model is viewed as having higher expertise but lower clarity: as a result, the statistical expert & the expert presenting a more concrete model are not significantly different in their persuasiveness. Finally, in contrast to most research on the criminal jury, it is found that deliberations do affect jury awards. 7 Tables, 2 Figures, 68 References. Adapted from the source document.

It is concluded that, when contrasted with the colonial dismissal of witchcraft as superstition, the policy of the postcolonial Cameroon state is in accord with the recognition of witchcraft as a crucial component in the relation between state & society. 11 References. The first book examines characteristics of civil litigators, focusing on the kinds of work they perform & the contexts in which they are performed, & explores the outcomes of litigation for lawyers & clients to engender an alternative image of lawyering. The second book offers an empirical account of how civil cases are negotiated, & evaluates the extent to which game theory, economic bargaining, & the sociology of negotiations accord with his own account of settlements. Both books, particularly if read as one, provide valuable insights into civil litigation, though each has limitations due to the nature of the data used. 20 References. W. Howard

¶ Roger B. Taney of Md, Chief Justice of the US, 1836-1864, has emerged as one of the most important influences on the contemporary US Supreme Court, even more significant than his better known predecessor John Marshall. Taney was a constitutional innovator who introduced doctrines, theories, & approaches–eg, legal positivism, result-oriented jurisprudence, dual federalism, substantive due process, & judicial policy making–that were later to define the activism of the Warren & Burger Courts (1953-1986). It is contended that the determinative ideological influence on Taney's expansive conception of judicial power was located in his southern background. 30 References. AA

Mnookin's & Lewis Kornhauser's formulation that negotiations occur in the shadow of the law ("Bargaining in the Shadow of the Law: The Case of Divorce," Yale Law Journal, 1979, 950), it is hypothesized that this effect depends on the way a claim is framed (which in turn is affected by the claimant's gender), on the mode of attorney involvement, & on claimant use of informational networks. These hypotheses are examined via analysis of a sample of 96 recently divorced men & women from Cook County (Ill) who were interviewed about negotiations that led to their custody & child-support arrangements. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 30 References. ¶ A literature review is drawn on to investigate whether Germans have lost a sense of justice. Key topics include: legal consciousness as a methodological problem; methodological aspects of research; the historical development & current state of research on legal consciousness; the instrumental use of legal consciousness in politics; the symbolic production & reproduction of legal consciousness; the postmodern pluralization of legal consciousness; & the outlook for future development. The thesis is advanced that changes in the sense of justice can be viewed as differentiation rather than overall decay. Several problems involved in the empirical identification of the sense of justice are identified. The need for revising the current theories of the rationalization of law is stressed. 76 References. ¶ Proceeding from a literature review addressing the current legal crisis, attention is focused on the ability of legal sociology to help comprehend recent trends in German juvenile criminal law, with special emphasis on diversion & alternative punishments. Recent decisions are viewed from the perspectives of materialization of law, reflexive law, & juridification. None of these three approaches adequately renders an image of what is really happening in terms of social control over youth. The most accurate image may be viewed as a negative variety of reflexive law: only a few material transformations occur in terms of intervention strategies, while formal aspects of due process disappear into a diffuse system of procedures 6 Graphs, 93 References. ¶ The march of technology challenges the legal system to find responsible solutions that are socially & juridically acceptable for a wide range of problems. The ignorance of many lawyers regarding technological problems exacerbates the problem. Instead of examining technological & social advances according to immanent legal criteria, most lawyers maintain images of technology linked to a romantic-conservative philosophy of civilization often resurfacing in postmodern social theories. Whereas in the nineteenth century, mechanics & kinetics suggested legal paradigms, contemporary images of science as a self-organizing system no longer fit juridical needs. To improve the chances for juridical control of technology from its inception, a new theory of technology should be developed in legal terms with attention given to normative aspects. Thus, it is imperative to link juridical concepts with results from interdisciplinary research. Adapted from the source document.

It is found that lawyers tend to handle more difficult cases & that the likelihood that legal representation will aid a tenant depends on case type & changes over time. Results, though likely to be context dependent, suggest how the effects of legal representation may be studied in other settings & the kinds of variables that may condition such effects. 8 Tables, 1 Appendix, 43 References. Nahamowitz's "Autopoietische Rechtstheorie: mit dem baldigen Ableben is zu rechnen" (Autopoietic Legal Theory: Expected to Die Soon [see SA 39:1/91X2862]). A brief overview is given of the autopoietic & control issues present in German sociology since the early 1970s. After classifying the effectiveness of laws in terms of their goal orientation, attention is focused on the differences between social control & social direction through the law. It is argued that Luhmann's opting for the latter ultimately leads to control over the law. 49 References. M. Meeks

¶ Examined is a sociological curiosity: how Australia & Nigeria came to adopt strikingly similar compulsory arbitration laws, despite the fact that they do not belong to the "family of nations," seem to have quite different political economies, & have no history of a direct subordinate-superordinate colonial relationship. Similarities in the countries' laws are pointed out, & it is clear that conventional explanatory factors for the emergence of compulsory arbitration law (ie, industrial turmoil, volatile economy, or military emergencies) are overly simplistic; a more rigorous explanation can be found in the nature of social control tradition that emerged in each country's formative period, remained significant when the law was enacted, & resulted in this particular form of control. 87 References. Husak, Drugs and Rights (Cambridge: Cambridge U Press, 1992); & Mark A. R. Kleiman, Against Excess: Drug Policy for Results (New York: Basic Books, 1992 [see listings in IRPS No. 68]). Zimring & Hawkins outline three ideal-type schools of thought about the war on drugs, but while they clearly articulate the view that the government's nonrational strategy serves only to hide a political agenda, they are unable to consistently define & address the implications of the argument. Husak's work scrutinizes ways in which an individual's moral rights are defended in the war on drugs, but his distinction among recreational, casual, persistent, habitual, & addictive drug use tends to dismiss the harm of drugs to users & others. Reading approximately the same sources as Husak, Kleiman compellingly contends that, from a cost-benefit analysis, drug use does in fact have the potential to seriously harm both users & the wider community. He also provides policy recommendations for making the war on drugs real. 62 References. M. Maguire

¶ A discussion of the rebirth of interest in the sociology of law (SofL) in Czechoslovakia following the overthrow of communism in 1989. After various definitions of the SofL are reviewed, attention is focused on the history of the SofL in Czechoslovakia before WWII. During the communist era, especially 1969-1989, only works marginally touching on the SofL were published. At the most general level, the SofL must be part of modern social analysis, based on pure sociological concepts, & including everyday social communication about law. Differences between the SofL & the philosophy of law are delineated. At present, the most important task is to develop a complex theory permitting description of general & concrete problems while leaving space for empirical research. 45 References. ¶ Michigan citizens (N = 224) called for jury duty over a 2-month period in 1989 were administered mail questionnaires designed to evaluate their comprehension of the law as given in the judges' instructions. Jurors were compared with a baseline of those who were called for duty but not selected to serve, & with those who served on different kinds of cases. Consistent with previous research on mock jurors, analysis indicated that actual jurors understand fewer than 50% of the instructions they receive at trial. Ss who received judges' instructions performed significantly better than uninstructed Ss on questions about the procedural law, but no better on questions about the substantive (criminal) law. Additionally, jurors who asked for help from the judge understood the instructions better than other jurors. ¶ Supplementing previous research on rape reform in the US, the effects of rape reform legislation introduced in Canada in 1983 are evaluated. The legislation replaced the offenses of rape & indecent assault with three new offenses of sexual assault in an attempt to: increase the number of victims reporting to the police, reduce the proportion of reports classified by the police as unfounded, & increase the number of cases in which a charge is laid. Here, time-series analysis of reports of crimes of sexual aggression, 1979-1988, indicates a significant increase in the number of reports of these crimes concurrent with the passage of the legislation, an increase that significantly exceeds the increase in reports of other personal injury offenses. There is no discernible effect of the legislation on the immediate criminal justice response to reports of sexual aggression: neither the % of reports classified as founded, nor the % of reported incidents resulting in the laying of a charge, changed. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 41 References. ¶ Problems in the administration of jury catchment areas in the legal systems of England & Wales are assessed, including the rationale for the system of jury representation & the link between the locality of an alleged crime & of the trial court. The primary focus is on the selection of eligible jurors from a locality–suspected to be at odds with the perceptions of the public, of those who work within the Crown Court system, & of the defendants–because "locality" has become relatively dilute & is no longer coterminous with designations of "local community." Issues of jury representativeness, supposedly ensured via random selection, are also addressed: a case study of jury service in 33 Crown Courts analyzes the volume of "not guilty" pleas & deliberated verdicts, which, although artificial measures, allows for standardized comparisons. 4 Tables, 5 References. ¶ Gabriel García Marquez's famous Chronicle of a Death Foretold (London: Cape, 1982) is recounted to discuss competing theoretical approaches to legal regulation of human behavior. Following a critique of current utilitarian models in sociolegal empirical research, three elements of an alternative approach are developed: (1) closure of discourses suggests examining the degree to which focal social situations immunize themselves against the invocation of legal norms; (2) recursivity of interaction suggests giving up the search for static correlations & identifying "attractors" & bifurcations in recursive social systems; & (3) structural coupling suggests going beyond simple models of legal effectiveness (norm sanction deviation) & replacing them with a model of acausal parallel processes & interference of legal & social self-regulation. 63 References. ¶ Most Western scholars of comparative jurisprudence contend that, since traditional non-Western societies possess neither codified law nor law-making/law-enforcement mechanisms, it is not possible to make comparisons between legal systems. Here, it is argued that the lack of codification & precedent reporting in non-Western societies does not imply the absence of law. Also, it is suggested that any meaningful comparison of Western & non-Western legal systems requires a comparative method that relies on sets of rights & obligations, which underlie the legal & normative ideas of any society. 2 Appendixes, 22 References. ¶ In a critique of the view of R. A. Duff in Trials and Punishments (Cambridge, 1986) that legal punishment can be ideally conceived on a model of penance, as a self-imposed suffering that expresses contrition & is socially restorative, it is argued here that the conditions needed to justify the coercive imposition of penances, & to motivate voluntary penitence, are met in some religious settings, but are not appropriate as regulative ideals for membership in modern secular societies. Penance aims to be reformative & restorative, while legal punishment necessarily has different social objectives, & a system of criminal law can sufficiently respect individual autonomy & rationality without having to construe its penalties as being morally deserved penances. ¶ Results from a research project in New York City, involving mass drug screening of arrestees as a mechanism for identifying defendants at high risk for pretrial misconduct, are compared to other evaluations of pretrial drug-testing programs. Interview data were collected in 1984 as part of a larger study of drug use patterns & pretrial behavior among a sample of male Manhattan arrestees (N = 3,462). The findings indicate that, in general, the ability to predict failure to appear, a key measure of pretrial misconduct, with the available defendant data was limited, although a number of models were constructed that improved this prediction. However, none of the models were able to classify more than 63% of the defendants correctly. These results are compared to other evaluations of pretrial drug-testing programs. Universal prearraignment drug-screening of arrestees to try to identify higher-risk defendants is not found to be cost-effective. It is argued that criminal justice policy should be sensitive to the multidimensional character of drug abuse, giving consideration to evidence about the number of types of drugs used, the duration of the use, the level of the abuse, & the costs of maintaining the drug use habit. Additional issues to consider about the efficacy of drug treatment as a condition of pretrial release includes the limited availability of effective treatments for poor urban users of cocaine & crack, a treatment time that is generally longer than the pretrial period, & the likelihood of continued use of drugs by individuals in treatment. 5 Tables, 41 References. ¶ The beating of Rodney King by Los Angeles (Calif) police officers is submitted to a Foucauldian genealogical analysis focusing on the "capillary" forms that power takes in its inscription on the body, which reveals how rationality & the body are situated in the grid of biopower. The "apparatus of rationality" (similar to Michel Foucault's other apparati of sexuality, sanity, health, etc) defines the "truth" about what kinds of body-subjects contemporary disciplinary society desires. The beatings of King (both physical & legal) are examined as a micropractice marking the body & subjectivity. In particular, King is seen as one who did not exhibit the features of a rational man in control of himself & his situation. Because his behavior thus violated the moral grid formed by modernity's notions of liberal individualism & its rational, free person, he was subjected to the "political technology of the body" & the "techniques of self" of the contemporary, instrumental society, which demands rationality, efficiency, & productivity. Among the points argued is that we, as bearers of the current society, are conspirators in the beating of King. Further, explanations of the beatings focusing on racism, classism, or elitism must themselves be located within an ensemble of practices & discourses that travel with rationality. Such an analysis implicates the "polymorphous techniques of power" that characterized Foucault's concern with revealing & resisting its machinery in contemporary society. 10 References. Reichel, Philip L. (Dept Sociology U Northern Colorado, Greeley 80639), The Misplaced Emphasis on Urbanization in Police Development, Policing and Society, 1992, 3, 1, 1-12.

¶ It is contended that analyses of the historical development of US law enforcement have been marked by an urban-North bias, typically ignoring events in the colonial & antebellum South, where law enforcement structures developed prior to & concurrently with those in the North. The existence of rural Southern precursors to formal police organizations suggests that urbanization is insufficient to explain why modern police developed. It is argued here that police structures developed out of a desire &/or perceived need by citizens to protect themselves & their property. In some places, this may have arisen as an aspect of urbanization, but in others, was more a response to conditions unrelated to urbanization. Future research should use broad concepts such as "police as protector" when attempting to chronicle the law enforcement developmental process. 2 Tables, 44 References. ¶ Many criminological studies on interactions in police interrogation of criminal suspects fail to examine microsociological structural features. As a result, the internal dynamics of the process are not clear, & consequently, neither is the structural motivation accorded to the police. Ultimately, criticism of police behavior becomes limited to evaluation by comparison with a norm. A new approach is presented to provide a new structural basis for comprehending the interrogation strategies of the police. It is not the police, but rather, the suspect who maintains dominance during the course of the interrogation session. Analysis reveals how fundamental contradictions within the legal framework under which the police must operate hamper their activities while leaving the suspect with a considerable range of freedom in responding to questions. 22 References. Shafer-Landau, Russ (Dept Philosophy U Arizona, Tucson 85721), Can Punishment Morally Educate?, Law and Philosophy, 1991, 10, 2, May, 189-219.

¶ Problems with formulations of the moral education theory of punishment are considered. (1) Contemporary educationists all place great emphasis on autonomy, yet fail to show how continued respect for autonomy is compatible with achievement of their stated punitive goals. (2) Educationists have, & possibly must, take incarceration as the best available punitive sanction. Yet it is unclear how morally educative such a punishment will be. (3) While contemporary educationists view punishment as a benefit to be conferred on an offender, they have not succeeded in arguing that society is obligated to confer such benefits, nor have they adequately defended the Platonic moral psychology necessary to show that moral education is always a benefit to justly punished offenders. (4) Though contemporary educationists are hopeful that an indeterminate sentencing policy can be avoided, such a policy is an ineliminable component of an educationist justification of punishment. Finally, doubts are raised about the scope that educationist goals ought to have in any comprehensive theory of punishment. Adapted from the source document. ¶ In 1989, a majority survey of 178 federally sentenced women was conducted in Canada, in the context of a task force established by the federal government to consider correctional management of this population. Findings of the survey & task force recommendations are outlined. It is contended that problems stem not just from the effects of control over women exercised by prison staff or agents of the justice system, but also by those who set out to defend them. Some issues are discussed in light of the views of the women themselves. 34 References. Modified AA (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ In colonial GB, policing was deliberately developed separately from the community by: using strangers as police, separating the police force from the rest of the population, & separating officers from the rank & file. The police acted as an instrument of government control: separation from the community created social distance that both increased the extent to which the police force could be controlled & the extent to which the police were seen as a visible symbol of government. As a consequence, when the community was dissatisfied with the government, the police were the most immediate target, & government could redirect dissatisfaction from itself to the police as an additional control strategy. Here, ethnographic data obtained in Bermuda & the Bahamas via participant observation, interviews, archival sources, & content analysis of newspapers & government documents are drawn on to show how these emerging independent commonwealths have adopted colonial policing methods. 32 References. ¶ The effects of intensive supervision probation/parole (ISP) for drug-involved offenders are summarized, based on evaluation findings from a randomized field experiment that collected data on 569 Ss in 5 urban areas. The results show that ISP offenders were seen more often, submitted more often to urinalysis testing for drugs, received more counseling, & had a higher level of employment than their counterparts on routine probation/parole supervision. With respect to 1-year recidivism outcomes, a higher proportion of ISP offenders had technical violations, primarily for drug use; further, more ISP offenders had been placed in jail or prison, generally for technical violations. This policy drove up system costs, averaging just under $8,000 per year per ISP offender vs about $5,500 per year per offender under routine supervision. It is suggested that the findings lend serious doubt to the claim that increased supervision, in & of itself, will reduce recidivism, decrease prison crowding, or save public funds. 1 Table, 5 Figures, 27 References. ¶ Cynicism toward prison administration is examined, based on questionnaire data from 198 line corrections officers at a medium-sized, medium-security midwestern prison. Three issues that pervade the research literature on corrections officer cynicism are discussed, ie, the relationship between cynicism & length of work tenure, officers' role orientations & performance, & officers' perceptions of officer-superior relations. Factors external to corrections work that may be correlated with cynicism are also discussed. Findings indicate that officers who perceive themselves to have greater influence on superiors tend to be less cynical toward prison administration. Further cynicism emerges early in officers' careers (often within their first month of duty); more experienced officers are significantly less cynical toward the administration. Also, military service shows a consistent negative relationship with cynicism. Implications of the findings for policy-oriented research on officer training, the officer-superior relations, & officers' relations with inmates are discussed. It is contended that interactionist concepts can sensitize cynicism research that is more adequately grounded in sociology theory, & that can contribute to the integration of theory, research, & policy. 5 Tables. ¶ An examination of the extent to which public police assume the role of private security in Houston, Tex, suggests that current crime trends & public disappointment with the criminal justice system may have contributed to the proliferation of private employment of off-duty police. The user-fee system of services has permeated many aspects of US society & may be appropriate under certain conditions. The prevailing public demand for economy within the government & subsequent fiscal restraints support the concept of supplementary police service for additional fees. The extent to which public police are being employed through private funds for security functions in Houston may be a strong indicator of the future of policing. 2 Tables, 23 References. ¶ A four-stage, comparative model linking litigation onset, process, & outcome in jail reform lawsuits is offered: (1) the "trigger" stage–long-standing practices & policies function in tandem with a triggering event, eg, a change in law or a riot, to set the stage for litigation; (2) the "liability stage"–specific legal claims are made, defendants are named, & litigation strategies are devised; (3) the "remedy" stage–the nature & degree of solutions is determined by complex interactions between litigants & judges; & (4) the "postdecree" stage–judicial methods & litigant behavior give form to negotiations, modifications, & compli ance efforts. Hypotheses linking the 4 stages are tested using data fron 43 lawsuits against Calif county jails 1975-1989. Results show that liti gation incidence, process, & legal outcomes were significantly influence by critical factors identified at each stage. Implications of a multimet hod, comparative approach for examining court-ordered reform of publi institutions are discussed. 70 References. Adapted from the source docu ment.

The analysis shows that popularizations & specialized scientific articles are not related in a simple dichotomy or scale & cannot be explained by a notion of the "general public"; rather, the various types of texts must be considered in terms of more complex relations between what are called, in semiotic terms, the enunciator & the enunciatee. 20 References. ¶ In a famous thesis (eg, see "Puritanism, Pietism and Science," in Social Theory and Social Structure, New York: Free Press, 1968 [1936], 628-660), Robert K. Merton identified two movements–English Puritanism & German Pietism–as causally significant in the development of the scientific revolution of the seventeenth & eighteenth centuries, attributing this connection to a strong compatibility between the values of ascetic Protestantism & those associated with modern science. Here, Merton's conclusion regarding German Pietism is challenged, arguing that the Pietist ethos stood in sharp conflict with what Merton called the "normative structure of science." One manifestation of this conflict involves Freidrich Oetinger's articulation of a contending "religious-mystical" conception of science (eg, see Die Philosophie der Alten [The Philosophy of the Ancients], Frankfurt & Leipzig, Germany, 1762), which assigned a central place to feeling, intuition, the role of the divine, & a qualitative approach to nature. It is argued that this conception of science provides the clearest indication of the conceptual & valuative distance that tended to separate Pietists from the "new science" of the time. 51 References. ¶ A comparative study is presented of two contributions to experimental science in the early modern period: Isaac Newton's research on light & colors, & Stephen Gray's on electricity. A detailed examination suggests that their conceptual innovations were achieved through a two-stage process (1) acquisition of dissenting experiences, accomplished by disengagement from, & breach of, conventional research practices & representations of natural phenomena; & (2) elaboration of symbolic, experimental, & rhetorical strategies & techniques by means of which these dissenting experiences were transformed into reproducible effects, or phenomena. Thus, both established themselves as participants in shaping the scope of research & its agenda. It is concluded that Newton's & Gray's considerations concerning their own social status as agents, rather than the seemingly universal requirement of cognitive consensus, were what rendered their empirical research effective in the production of knowledge. ¶ Proceeding from the view that continuing education is a channel for communication, a study is presented of its potential for the popularization of scientific knowledge. Concurrent processes of conversion & diffusion are spreading useful bits of scientific knowledge in a special form. The mutual expectations of scientific theorization & practical implementation need to be considered. The potential & limits of the popularization of scientific throught are especially debated among social scientists, due to the lack of institutionalization of typical expenditure procedures, described in K.-G. Riegel's Öffentliche Legitimation der Wissenschaft ([Public Legitimation of Science] Stuttgart, 1974). By viewing the expenditure relations of scientific knowledge from the standpoint of the scientific system, it is argued that Riegel confuses mediators of scientific knowledge with experts. Thus, the utilization of scientific knowledge is treated as an appropriate mediation for an ignorant practice, not as a form of tranformation or clarification of everyday knowledge. The development of CAD/CAM as a productivity tool ultimately fails to satisfy the various users, who are competing for design & manufacturing resources. 63 References. ¶ Pierre Bourdieu's habitus concept is used to describe a mechanism relating implicit & explicit knowledge underlying the production of pictures by approximately 50 astronomers over 1.5 years. The nature of the pictures that these astronomers worked with as well as the kind of work done with them is also defined, emphasizing how these habitus are developed as well as their specific content. Particular attention is given to the aesthetic component of these habitus since this is the main locus of the interaction of implicit & explicit knowledge. It is concluded that: (1) the more important components are implicit; (2) representations are actualized habitus; (3) the habitus is the means by which many mechanisms are constantly activated without the astronomers having to think about them, & are thus what makes the astronomers' work possible; (4) it is also the means by which reflexivity is achieved when something new is encountered; & (5) finally, it is what constrains the astronomer's perception & enables him to interpret new phenomenon in a new way. 16 References. ¶ Selected arguments for the radical, epistemological approach to the social study of science developed from the ethnomethodolgical, reflexive position are critiqued. Steve Woolgar's constructivist analyses of the sociology of scientific knowledge (eg, see Science: The Very Idea, London: Tavistock, 1988) suggest an antipathy to theorizing as an alternative to the ontological gerrymandering of scientific, objectivist discourse, & point to scientists' use of instrumental irony for privileging one's own theory by trivializing another researcher's claims. In suggesting a constitutive version, it is argued that Woolgar has himself used instrumental irony & ontological gerrymandering by implicitly favoring a particular account of the social world of science. Since constructivism requires an integration of reflective & constitutive versions of the same reality, it introduces problems of ontological adequacy. Building from Harold Garfinkel's formulation of the reflexivity problem, Woolgar avoids the "you too" argument of other science critics that engages a moral ideological representationalism. His needless challenge of such a hegemonic discourse is an exercise in dynamic irony at the local level, but not effective as a critique of the processes & events beyond the locally contingent. 25 References. ¶ Contrary to a widespread legend of Albert Einstein as a highbrow theorist who all-knowingly anticipated essential experimental results, it is demonstrated on the basis of quotes from unpublished correspondence & overlooked newspaper articles that, between 1907 & 1927, Einstein was extremely interested in experimental tests of relativity theory. He eagerly motivated specialists to search for these effects & actively helped to provide them with institutional backing, especially during his years in Berlin, Germany, where he held several powerful science policy positions. Examples like that of the astronomer Erwin Finlay Freundlich, who became the first director of the Einstein tower solar telescope, which was designed & built in 1920 with the primary aim of testing Einstein's prediction of gravitational redshift of spectral lines, show how much Einstein pressed some observers to come up with results. 2 Tables, 4 Figures. Jacoby, Sally & Gonzales, Patrick, The Constitution of Expert-Novice in Scientific Discourse, Issues in Applied Linguistics, 1991, 2, 2, Dec, 149-181.

¶ It is argued that an examination of expert-novice relationships in unfolding interaction should not proceed from the static & unidirectional view that knowledge & status are distributed as functions of a priori categories, eg, age, gender, & hierarchical rank. Although analysis of interactional sequences from group meetings of a university physics team reveals the co-occurrence of professional status & expertise in some segments of the data, conversation analysis indicates that the constitution of expert-novice in dynamic interaction is a more complicated reconstruction of self & other, whether within a speaker's talk or between speakers. It is demonstrated that the constitution of a participant as expert at any moment in an ongoing interaction can also be a simultaneous constitution of some other participant (or participants) as less expert, & that these interactionally achieved identities are only candidate constitutions of self & other until a subsequent interactional move either ratifies or rejects them in some way. This view of expert-novice relations can account not only for the bidirectionality postulated in those models of apprenticeship, socialization, & learning that are based on activity theory but also for change & innovation in communities of practice. It is contended that the analysis of language use should go beyond the extrinsic social, cultural, & biological identities of speakers & recipients & should include an analysis of how utterances constitute these identities & are organized despite these identities. 49 References. ¶ In the recent debate (in Fuller, S., et al (Eds), The Cognitive Turn: Sociological and Psychological Perspectives on Science, Dordrecht: Reidel, 1989) with Donald Campbell, David Bloor argues that the widely held belief that his & Barry Barnes's (eg, see T. S. Kuhn and Social Science, New York: Columbia U Press, 1982) sociological analyses regard scientific belief change as occurring in a referential vacuum is due to the critics' misunderstanding of the so-called network model of language learning that has been central to the development of their strong program in the sociology of knowledge. Originally developed by Mary Hesse (The Structure of Scientific Inference, Berkeley: U of California Press, 1974), the network model has two essential components: the coherence principle & the correspondence principle. Considered as a purely sociological model of language learning detached from any historical applications, the model certainly takes into account the role played by the natural world in the construction & selection of scientific knowledge. However, in using this model to explain the reception of the corpuscular philosophy in the seventeenth century & Mendelian genetics at the early twentieth century, both Bloor & Barnes did not adhere to what they preach & deliberately exaggerate the role played by the coherence principle of the network to support their sociological arguments & neglect the ways in which it is crucially influenced by the other component of the model, ie, empirical observation. By reexamining Bloor's & Barnes's relativistic arguments regarding the emergence of corpuscular philosophy & Mendelian genetics, it is argued that Bloor's & Barnes's relativistic or ontologically nihilistic sociology of science can never provide a plausible causal scenario as to the belief change process of scientists & hence cannot cope with the problem of explaining theory change in science. 46 References AA (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

Markus, George (U Sydney, New South Wales 2006 Australia), Changing Images of Science, Thesis Eleven, 1992, 33, 1-56.

¶ It is contended that the history of science is best understood against a background of Enlightenment images concerning humankind's relation to both the natural & social worlds, & the conflicts between these images. The origin of modern science is examined via analyses of the writings of René Descartes & Francis Bacon, whose philosophies shared a profound ambiguity with respect to the categorical characterization of science, waffling between a subjectivist & an objectivist understanding. Also discussed is the connection between science & democracy, the Kantian image of science, & Max Weber's theory of the limitations & functions of science. It is suggested that a third approach to science is needed that considers the epistemological claims of scientific experiments & the social practices of scientists within the context of a system of sui generis social relations that constitute science as a historically contingent cultural genre. ¶ Though scientific research is victim to many types of misrepresentation & bias, only a few narrowly defined behaviors are singled out & castigated as scientific fraud (SF). A narrow definition of SF is convenient to the groups in society–scientific elites, governments, & large corporations–that provide the most funding, & thus have the dominant influence on priorities in science. Several prominent Australian cases illustrate how the denunciation of SF helps to paint the rest of scientific behavior as blameless. Adapted from the source document. Drawing on interviews with 20 city council employees & 2 residents of Lancaster, England, about various sources of ionizing radiation, it is suggested that understanding is tied to questions of social identity that encompass relations of differentiation from & identification with science & the institutions in which it is embedded. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 32 References. ¶ Drawing on the insights of contemporary feminist & critical theory, submerged & marginalized alternatives to dominant modes of scientific discourse are explored, focusing on how past medical science became a gendered enterprise. A critical rereading of the writings of Elizabeth Blackwell, a significant nineteenth-century physician, demonstrates that Blackwell, faced with rapidly changing definitions of science in medicine, remained critical of objectivity as the preferred form of knowing, & suspicious of the laboratory medicine that promoted it. In assessing the value of social-constructivist theories of science to the history of medicine, highlighted are the ways in which feminist theorists have turned their attention to gender as a category of analysis in scientific thinking. This new approach to modern science questions its identification with "male" objectivity, reason, & mind, set in opposition to "female" subjectivity, feeling, & nature. Mass education is not necessarily incompatible with the education of scientists, but public education must be modernized & made a government priority. There is a risk that in changing scientific curricula, the university will ally itself with industry & the government, with insufficient attention to social needs. ¶ It is contended that the emergence of science in the late nineteenth century as a symbol of Western power not only constituted the "native" as an object of scientific discourse, but also displaced representations of colonial domination. Here, these displacements are examined within the context of British-occupied India, tracing how the deployment of science to Indian culture & its people produced "inappropriate" transformations in the representation of science. These inappropriate transformations are examined in the functioning of museums & exhibitions as cultural sites for representing science in British India. It is argued that the staging of science in museums & exhibitions also enacted other cultural performances & led to schisms in science's identity. W. ¶ The contemporary debate on the distinction between the natural & human sciences is examined. Charles Taylor (eg, see Philosophy and the Human Sciences,Cambridge: Cambridge U Press, 1985) puts forth the idea that a radical discontinuity based on ontological difference exists between the natural & human sciences. This difference is challenged by Richard Rorty (eg, see Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity, Cambridge: Cambridge U Press, 1989) who disputes Taylor's use of hermeneutics. However, Rorty misunderstands Taylor's position & its political implications. Because the outcomes of social science research have tremendous impact on social decision making, social science & its methodology are faced with a moral obligation that has no equivalent in the natural sciences. The social sciences must be conceived to avoid consequences inimical to the reproduction & maintenance of participatory, democratic institutions. 24 References. Adapted from the source document. They convey the argument that rationalist secular science is dangerous by investigating the evil of science in the personality of the scientist. This cultural critique of science is analyzed here, demonstrating how the symbols of the scientist's personality are manipulated. Mad scientists became increasingly amoral as nineteenth-century texts were adapted to twentieth-century films. The consequence is that this cultural critique is becoming even more severe, due to external reasons independent of the activities of real scientists. 50 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Science in Mexico is gradually entering the lives of urban dwellers, but it remains in a precarious state, primarily because not enough scientists are being educated. Establishing a state scientific-technological policy could create a problem in that the government would define it. ¶ Applied research & development (R&D) should be primarily sponsored in the private sector by firms who would most likely use the results. It is argued that when government finances applied R&D, the choice of projects becomes politicized. Many firms are willing to take on such R&D contracts merely to make a profit on that work, even if it does not lead to useful products. On the contrary, firms on their own are unlikely to sponsor R&D that they do not expect to lead to commercial payoffs. Government can take specific action to encourage private R&D activity, eg, by reducing regulatory barriers to the introduction of new products, promoting a larger flow of risk capital through tax reform, & updating archaic patent & antitrust laws. It is suggested that government's role should be to sponsor basic research, ie, scientific activity for which no company or individual is likely to capture the full range of benefits; as the rewards accrue to the society as a whole, the costs must likewise be assumed by society as a whole. ----, The Historical Ethnography of Scientific Rituals, Social Epistemology, 1992, 6, 4, Oct-Dec, 323-387.

¶ In A Historical Ethnography of a Scientific Anniversary in Molecular Biology: The First Protein X-Ray Photograph (1984, 1934), Pnina Abir-Am (Johns Hopkins U, Baltimore, Md) examines how the performative action at a scientific anniversary (held at Cambridge, England, in 1984) commemorating the first X-ray protein photograph can be profitably studied from a joint, complementary historico-ethnographic perspective. Drawing on interview data & social impressions of the actors involved in the first protein photograph, the analysis suggests a preliminary agenda for a historical ethnography of scientific anniversaries, & explains how the anniversary transformed a fifty-year-old nonevent into the origin of the highly fashionable & prestigious "ultradiscipline" of molecular biology. In Historical Ethnography as a Way of Knowing (with Response), Barbara Frankel (Lehigh U, Bethlehem, Pa) examines Abir-Am's deconstruction of the anniversary commemorating the first X-ray protein photograph, offers a brief explication of deconstruction, lauds Abir-Am's ethnography, & offers reflections on the advantages & disadvantages of using ethnography in studies of science culture. In a Response, Abir-Am praises Frankel's comment pertaining to the irrelevance of the deconstructive turn for ethnographic interpretation, & discusses problems associated with historical ethnography. In Construction, Alienation and Emancipation: Thoughts on Abir-Am's Ethnography of Scientific Rituals (with Response), Kenneth Gergen (Swarthmore Coll, Pa) focuses on issues of power & domination to argue that, in her ethnography, Abir-Am remains too close to the community of interlocutors whose reality she attempts to interpret, & that she lacks sufficient alienation (objectivity) to allow the analysis to reach its full potential. In a Response, Abir-Am disagrees that she lacks the requisite alienation, & praises Gergen's suggestion that a microsocial analysis that could demonstrate the indexicality of foundational terms within X-ray protein photography would go far in challenging the semantic link that imbues objective validity to scientific accounts. In The Rituals of Science: Comments on Abir-Am (with Response), Hugh Gusterson (Massachusetts Instit of Technology, Cambridge) praises Abir-Am's analysis, but faults it for a problematic account of scientific ritual that falls short in terms of content & voice. Also discussed is how to write reflexively & sympathetically about scientists, while maintaining a critical perspective that affords deconstructive leverage on the project of science itself. In a response, Abir-Am agrees with Gusterson's assertion that the ritual of scientific anniversary not only creates an interpretation of the science in question, but also projects the transcendent power of science itself. The issue of the national composition of the clan--a topic raised by Gusterson--is considered, as are methodological constraints in historical ethnography. 5 Appendixes. W. ¶ In response to the loss of self-sufficiency in the production of foodstuffs in Mexico, biotechnological solutions seemed to provide hope. In the green revolution (GR), the governments of Mexico & other Latin American countries supported a "technological package" that included genetically improved seeds, along with appropriately advanced fertilization & irrigation techniques. The principal beneficiaries of the GR were the multinational corporations in processing & agricultural manufacturing, because the technological package necessitated intensive capital appropriate for commercial agriculture, not subsistence farming. The implementation of the GR has increased class inequalities & contributed to malnutrition in less-developed countries. An alternative scenario for biotechnology is presented that differs in many ways from the GR, eg, in its objectives, origins, level of socialization of knowledge involved, & types of infrastructure demands. In this scenario, which favors individual farmers & intensive agriculture, a market for products that have not been chemically treated is created, along with a different price structure & different consumers. 30 References. ¶ The conventional wisdom about scientific fraud holds that it is extremely rare, extremely serious, & either pertains to an important subject (in which case it is always & quickly caught), or else involves such an esoteric point that it goes undetected (with little consequence). This begs the question of why some actions are considered fraudulent & others, eg, reporting only expected & desired results are generally not. One answer is that the definition of fraud, both within & outside the scientific community, is convenient to the most powerful groups doing science. Yet there are some practices that could, given some shift in the paradigm, be considered unethical, even fraudulent: the implication of scientific papers that researchers actually follow the "scientific method;" the lifting of ideas from grant proposals by referees; failing to report null results; & ideological bias. In fact, science, technology, government policy on science, & the production systems are so interrelated that, in a technological revolution, the relationships between scientific investigation, technological development, & the means of production are forced to change. Technological investigation has appeared as a form of scientific investigation in the academic area, but conflict between this form & the dominant cultural sphere of science has persisted. Data on biotechnological research capabilities in Mexico are presented in terms of: areas of investigation, human resources, funding sources, institutional participation, & linkages with the productive sector. The focus of vegetal biotechnology is on potential industrial or commercial applications. Agroindustrial biotechnology has more promise in Mexico, especially in its application to the production of food substitutes for animal protein products; however, progress is limited by the state of scientific & techno-

¶ After state intervention in 1970, the Mexican sugar industry entered a crisis period in which production did not meet internal industrial demand. By 1980, sugar production had also been seriously affected by external factors; as a result, Mexico changed from sugar exporter to importer. Reprivatization in the late 1980s has helped in meeting industrial demand, but the situation is still serious. In contrast to the blows that biotechnology dealt to this industry in the 1970s & 1980s (ie, the development of sugar substitutes), its application in the 1990s should enable the sugar industry to diversify, as well as to alleviate the food shortage problem, in Mexico. Diversification into molasses, unicellular proteins, & other subproducts could revitalize this industry, as evidenced by two case studies on BIOFERMAL & CINVESTAV-SF. However, an alternative platform with Ecodesarrollo stresses a new agrarian policy that gives economic guarantees to small & large agricultural property owners alike. ¶ A discussion of what makes a role for the university in technologica development possible. Technology development is a product of "cosmo politan technical regimes," ie, supralocal organizations of technical prac tices & knowledge. Two substrates of such regimes are distinguished "design hierarchies," which enable the dispersed production & design d artefact components & hence enable an interorganizational division o design labor; technical models, which are symbolic representations of ar tefacts that allow designers to manipulate parameters in a virtual, predic tive mode. The production of such models (here called "metal design") may be organizationally dissociated from actual design & hence give ri to a cognitive division in design labor. The possibility for distributin meta-design labor is the main explanation for how nineteenth-centu polytechnics, & later universities, could contribute to prosaic design l bor without jeopardizing their jealously guarded scientific & scholar status. The classical configuration broke up with the rise of corporate r search labs between the two world wars. Universities no longer had a m nopoly on meta-design & their incorporation in technical regimes b came fragmentary. It is shown how this fragmentation can be explain using the concept of design hierarchy, & an emergent third phase in t university-technology relationship is noted that is characterized by t incorporation of universities in state-sponsored strategic research & d velopment programs as pragmatic purveyors of bits & pieces of techno gy. 1 Figure, 52 References. ¶ Aero Research, a pioneering enterprise founded in 1934 by Norman de Bruyne, a Cambridge U (England) scientist, is used as a case study to explore the strengths & weaknesses of technology-based companies with academic origins. Topics discussed include: (1) the importance of a knowledge network for technology transfer & of collective effort by a professional team; (2) the need for a close relationship with a major company, & (3) the vulnerability of innovative enterprises to takeover by a larger corporation, which provides needed resources at the price of a reduction in innovative capacity. Technology-based ventures of this kind contribute to & are shaped by processes of technology transfer. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Most of the earth's biodiversity resides in tropical forests. Biotechnology, based on commercial use of micro- & other organisms & research in genetic engineering, does not currently offer a solution to the threats of biodiversity. However, biotechnology can indirectly contribute to the ex situ & in situ preservation of the rainforests. From an ex situ perspective, it can contribute by: increasing production of foodstuffs so that the tropical forests need not be cut down for agricultural land; developing seek banks & botanical gardens; & developing the process of cryopreservation. From an in situ perspective, it can contribute by identifying subspecies. Biotechnology can also contribute to the profitable utilization of biodiversity with genetic engineering of plants & animals, & control of animal disease. Due to the socioeconomic impacts & risks to biodiversity associated with biotechnology, international policy on biotechnology & biodiversity should be formulated. 1 Table, 47 References. M. Pflum

¶ In the last two decades, the political discussion on genetic engineering has focused on the production site, where there was much concern about new forms of bacteria multiplying out of control & spreading beyond the confines of the laboratory; eg, a great controversy arose in the US when Campbell Soup & Heinz Co sought to utilize genetically enhanced supertomatoes in their product lines. Now, however, the new products are reaching the marketplace, & concern is shifting toward the place of consumption. A literature review addresses the myths & realities of this biological revolution. Special attention is given to the dispute over the dangers of recombinant DNA used in somatotropin, a bovine growth hormone. Attempts by the new genetic industries to influence the ethics code so that their products can be sold are discussed, identifying strategies developed to minimize contacts between producers & consumers. 76 References. ¶ The path from scientific explanations & discoveries to technological innovations & their socioeconomic applications is very tortuous. Internal & external processes of technology transfer are contrasted here, emphasizing the crucial role of the transition from the feasibility phase to peripheral implementation. Special attention is given to personnel problems & to the role of feedback from operations departments to the laboratory. External transfer occurs through many research teams, universities, businesses, scholarly associations, & state institutions on the scale of the world market; examples from the electronics industry are cited. Though technology transfer, as an integral component of the innovation process, should be profitable for all involved, at present it is an inherent weakness of the system, despite undeniable scientific & technological progress. The challenge ahead is improve technology by strengthening the weakest link in the chain. 3 Figures. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A summation of the proceedings of an international symposium on the social mastery of technology held 9-12 Sept 1991 in Lyon, France, under the auspices of the CNRS Industrial Research Group, the Maison Rhône-Alpes des Sciences de l'Homme, & UNESCO. Two main themes are considered: (1) the very nature of the relationship between scientific activities & technological development, both of which are social activities indissociable from the political, social, & economic institutions in which they are rooted. The weak mechanisms of political control over scientific & technological evolution are described, & the problems of ethics, scientists' & public policymakers' responsibility, & democratic control over scientific activity are explored. Several questions relating to the general problem of technology & society are also addressed at macro- & microsocial levels. (2) The preliminaries to a social mastery of technology are analyzed, focusing on contradictions arising from the globalization of technology from the national framework of economic & social regulation, the necessary development of technology as a science of techniques, & a better understanding not only of the economic & social consequences of technology, but also of the mechanisms through which scientific knowledge & organizational or technological artifacts are generated. ¶ Biotechnology is actually a diverse group of technologies in various stages of evolution & development. Biotechnological developments in pharmaceuticals have probably attracted the most attention, especially of investors, but biotechnological research is also being conducted on seeds, livestock, industrial enzymes, & artificial sweeteners. In the biotechnological area, three main groupings are described: genetic modification, monoclonal antibodies, & the cultivation of vegetal tissues & cells. In relation to agricultural productivity, agricultural biotechnology holds promise in the areas of: resistance to herbicides, disease, & insects; better efficiency of fertilizers; temperature tolerances; & nutritive value of food. Other applications of biotechnology are discussed. 4 References. M Pflum (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ In a discussion of the nature of social studies of technology from the perspective of "reconstitutive interpretivism," it is suggested that field examinations of the use of computerized technologies provide needed opportunities for social epistemologists to refine theory. The plea of Steve Woolgar & Keith Grint (see SA 40:1/92Y2478) for more reflexive accounts of science & technology, therefore, should be heeded–but not too literally. In Computers, Guns, and Roses: What's Social about Being Shot? Grint (Brunel U, Uxbridge, Middlesex UB8 3PH London, England) & Woolgar respond to the three criticisms made by Kling of constructivist-oriented researchers like themselves: being "crusaders against error," failing to engage in practical debates, & appearing to render technology itself irrelevant. In When Gunfire Shatters Bone: Reducing Sociotechnical Systems to Social Relations, Kling reiterates the need for well-grounded narratives about social constructions & the role of technologies in altering human well-being. 21 References. ¶ In this 1992 acceptance speech for the Award of Honorary Membership in the National Assoc for Science, Technology, & Society, the need to integrate both the scientific & the humanistic-social fields is stressed. Although admitting that science has contributed to some of the world's problems, it is claimed that scientific study has led to a number of improvements, most notably in Western civilization, where it is often employed. Since these remaining problems are described as interface problems resulting from the interaction of science with society, a dual approach that encompasses both the technological & the social aspects is needed to solve them. ¶ New informational technologies, more than any other aspect of modernity, are changing many areas of our life, eg, economics, politics, & the legal system. In the developed economies, information is endlessly made available, traded, transformed, & is highly valued as a commodity. Aside from print media, computer technology, TV, & radio, now available are cable communication systems, videodiscs, satellites, & home videos, allowing for the construction of complex, integrated networks. Thus, information occupies the place in the postindustrial economy that raw materials occupied in the industrial economy. Changes in the workplace include: flexible mental work replacing simple manual labor; frequent changing of jobs instead of static career development; decentralization of work & decision making; cooperative instead of individual effort; & a shift from monotonous to creative work. More effort is needed to see how humans learn. The schoolday should be lengthened, & new emphasis placed on continuing education. M. ¶ The characteristics & the social importance of phytogenetic (vegetal) resources & their diversification are analyzed. Access to phytogenetic material is found in the less-advanced countries of the world, including Mexico, but these genetic resources are taken by developed countries without reimbursement commensurate with their potential wealth; in fact, the cost to businesses & consuming societies of acquiring basic genetic material from developing countries is essentially zero. Given that international regulations on the interchange of phytogenetic resources between countries do not exist, states should actively participate in defining the regulatory coordination of scientific & technological activities involving these resources. The Latin American & Caribbean Commission on Phytogenetic Resources, founded in 1986, is examining how the negotiations over the North American Free Trade Agreement, legal protection for industrial & intellectual properties, & international obligations influence these resources. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 19 References. ¶ Within the green revolution, biotechnology is used to increase food production with the goal of alleviating world hunger. Although pesticides & herbicides play an important part in this process, they can have particularly noxious effects on ecosystems, many pests have developed immunity to them, & they are often prohibitively expensive for Third World producers. Vegetal species have been developed that produce their own pesticides & resist adverse climactic conditions, but these are not yet economically viable & socially acceptable. With multinational companies (MNCs) monopolizing the production of both new biochemical products & agrochemical products, it is in their interests to manipulate the introduction of vegetal species that do not require the concurrent use of pesticides. MNCs are more interested in developing vegetal species resistant to herbicides, so that herbicides can be sold concurrently. The pesticide industry in Mexico, & product development & operation of three large MNCs–Monsanto, Ciba-Geigy, & Sandox–are examined as case studies of this manipulation. Since antagonism between commercial interests & quality of life is apparent, it is suggested that biotechnology needs more government regulation. 6 Tables, 13 References. ¶ A review essay on a book by Pierre-Michel Rosner, Revolución de la biotechnología o tercera revolución agrícola? ((Biotechnological Revolution or Third Agricultural Revolution?) Azcapotzalco, Mexico: UAM, 1990). Rosner views biotechnological advance as passing into a phase where the control of agricultural components & products are more important than the control of production & land per se. In the past, as now, innovation & diffusion represent two completely different aspects of biotechnology, but the capital pouring into biotechnology is reducing the temporal distance between these two aspects. The actors, motivations, & recipients of biotechnology are all interrelated. ¶ France's agroalimentary industry (AAI) is one of the principal sectors for the application of biotechnology. The French AAI is divided into two main groupings: working with raw products from agriculture, mainly within powerful cooperatives; & preparing treated materials for distribution & consumption. Competitive factors–eg, domination over primary materials &, more recently, differentiation of products–have contributed to changes in the AAI. Due to these & other factors, mere possession of biotechnology does not mean competitive dominance. Biotechnology has impacted the AAI by: improving the production of the largest crops, introducing new primary agricultural materials, & influencing the production of intermediary products. Social, legal, & financial limitations pertaining to this sector also exist. 7 Tables. M. Pflum (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ The technological construction of political power & of resistance to it are examined in terms of an ideal-typical model known as a "technological drama." In "technological regularization," a design constituency creates the artifacts that reveal its intention to control the distribution of wealth, power, & status in society, as well as the myths, social contexts, & rituals that legitimate its power & its choice of artifacts. The people adversely affected by technological regularization seek either to accommodate the imposed system through myth-, context-, or artifact-altering strategies of their own (technological adjustment), or to change the imposed system (technological reconstitution). The enactment of a technological drama, thus, is a specifically technological form of political discourse in which both political intentions & technology's impact are always themselves constituted & constructed as technological activities. 48 References. ¶ A discussion of the "minor mode of reality," ie, the diffuse critical capacity of the individual in social situations, including the capacity for lateral identification, division, inattention, & distraction. This approach to the sociological individual contrasts classical works in sociology & anthropology, in which the methods of direct observation & textual strategies disregard this minor mode of reality. Such ethnographic facts are integrated theoretically by the notion of paradox, as developed by Yves Barel (Le Paradoxe et le système [The Paradox and the System], 2nd edition, Grenoble: Presses Universitaires de Grenoble, 1989). Implied from Barel's notion is the epistemological option of the double paradoxical impossibility of breaking or not breaking with society; different strategies of paradoxical implication are noted. Also questioned is the logic of the social, which does not function at 100%, & the notion of paradox is generalized to the social fact that both is & is not. 16 References. ¶ A discussion of the case of John Moore v. Regents of the University of California, in which the California Supreme Court ruled that Moore was entitled to no conversion or property rights to his bodily tissues, points to the regestalting of truth & virtue, body & person. Based on extended patent laws established in 1980 concerning living matter, the boundaries of the body & its ownership were at issue in the case, involving the patenting doctors (MDs) at the U of California, Los Angeles, of an immortal cell line from tissue removed from the plaintiff. Legal, ethical, medical, economic, technoscientific, & media-related aspects of the case are examined. Also noteworthy are the institutional & cultural arrangements made between research medicine, pharmaceutical companies, & private MDs. It is suggested that older values linked to Christian concepts of the sacred & resurrectable vessel of the body, & liberal concepts of the rational human actor as contractual negotiator, have disappeared during late modern culture, & technological commitment to the fragmented body has usurped the wholeness of the person. 25 References. ¶ The impact of biotechnology on the process of capital accumulation during a crisis period in agriculture is analyzed. The crisis was caused by the subordination of agriculture to industry, & by the mechanism of profiting from the land. Biotechnology appears to offer an exit from this crisis in the capitalist world. In the third scientific-technological revolution, led by biotechnology, industry is profiled as the promoter of biotechnology by virtue of its capacity to develop commercial production of this new form of technology. The use of biotechnology is destined to radically transform the previous contradictory linkage between industry & agriculture, as well as to transform the international division of labor. Dependent countries will not be able to integrate the new standards of world agricultural competence, with a resulting loss of jobs. Mexico's position in this revolution is described. The potential of such industries to determine both economic growth & a nation's geopolitical importance contrasts with the maturing or declining automobile, railroad, steel, & textile industries that dominated the first part of the twentieth century. ¶ After 1975, sales in the coffee market dropped as a result of oversupply, speculation, violation of production agreements by members of the International Coffee Organization, & increasing consumption of carbonated beverages. Biotechnology's entrance into the marketplace means that new types of coffee can be synthesized, & thereby produced in countries other than the traditional tropical coffee-producing ones. These changes have strong implications, not only for the peasants farming the coffee plantations, but also for the producers of the poorer-quality beans. In Mexico, coffee producers serve an important function in the national economy; biotechnological changes in coffee cultivation will affect small-scale Mexican farmers, processors, & distributors, who may no longer be able to compete in the world market. 20 References. ¶ While in 1967 only 33% of all husband-wife families were dual-earner families, that figure had grown to nearly 66% by 1989. Here, the evolution of the dual-earner family is explored to identify transformations in the labor force participation of wives, labor market experiences of husbands, & family demographics. Comparative data from Canada's Survey of Consumer Finances for 1968 & 1990 indicate that almost every sector of the economy has been transformed in order to accommodate the new norm: flextime, shiftwork, compressed work weeks, & child care services have become increasingly popular; shops maintain longer hours to serve their working clients; & the government, while receiving more in tax revenue, must now provide services & pensions to a much larger workforce. 5 Tables, 3 Charts, 9 References. Cohen, Michael L. (U Maryland, College Park 20742), Choice and Conflict about Census Data Adjusting the American Census Count, Journal of Public Policy, 1991, 11, 4, Oct-Dec, 357-398.

¶ It is argued that the US Census–which involves interactions betwen public laws, governmental institutions, & citizens' responses to official inquiries–is a social fact, but is not, however, an objective measure of all people living within the US borders. Reasons for the inevitable defects in the census count, & attempts by the US Census Bureau to identify the sources of error & estimate their impact are identified. Although it is possible to compensate for sampling errors, the use of census data for policy purposes (economic & political reallocations between groups) has long meant that statistical adjustments to the initial census counts are politically contentious. The reasons underlying this political conflict are explored, & the extent to which it concomitantly stems from causes outside the US is considered. 2 Tables, 63 References. Comment, 37-44, Response, 45-47.

¶ The relationship between population growth & economic growth is examined, arguing that a decrease in the rate of population growth neither imposes economic burdens on young workers nor threatens continued growth of living standards. It is maintained that a slowdown in population growth is, in fact, essential to sustaining standards of living, & that a "child tax" is needed to decrease population growth. The potential of markets to rectify problems (eg, environmental problems) created by overpopulation is also discussed. In A Comment on "Population Growth, Economic Growth and Market Economies," Keith Griffin (U of California, Riverside) agrees with Ehrlich et al that a slow rate of population growth does not damage the moral foundations of society, nor reduce living standards, but challenges their assertion that increasing fertility rates spell disaster for future generations, & argues that reducing fertility is not a global problem that merits top priority. It is contended that the most effective way to reduce population is to educate women & increase the number of women in the labor force. In Government, Bedrooms, and the Environment: A Response to Keith Griffin, Ehrlich, Daily, & Goulder defend their claim that government intervention in the sphere of reproduction not only is in the best interest of society, but also is required by the earth's ecosystem. ¶ Though the literature has generally treated migration patterns in Melanesia as rural-based, circular, temporary movements, it is argued here that since 1955, the urban population has tripled. This discrepancy is attributed to problems in previous research regarding underlying operationalizations, methodologies, & theoretical conceptualizations. Here, a case study of lifetime mobility patterns among Paamese men & women in Port Vila in the island Republic of Vanuatu demonstrates that individualization of land tenure, monetization of bridewealth payments, & the reemergence of communal work groups are both a cause & a result of rural-urban mobility. 1 Table, 3 Figures, 93 References. ¶ To obtain disaggregated long-range microlevel population projections from aggregative projections, a loglinear model is proposed & tested using US data. Total household population is broken down into 120 subgroups based on household factors, eg, region of location, age, size, & female's employment status. For reference, both random-walk & time-trend methods for disaggregating are also applied to the data. After evaluating the projections of estimated number of households with all 3 techniques using 5 different error measures, it is found that the loglinear model made superior projections of the size of the observed & estimated subgroups for 1960 & 1980. 9 Tables, 34 References. ¶ Despite exposure to factors usually associated with risk of child mortality (eg, low education, low status of women, exposure to war), the Hmong "hill tribe" minority in Thailand has experienced a decline over the last 30 years in infant mortality, from over 120 to under 50 per 1,000 live births. This trend is accounted for by improved access to & increase utilization of modern curative & preventive medical care associated wi major changes in social & hygienic conditions. Perceptions of the Hmon regarding child mortality are examined using data collected by surv questionnaire, observation, & unstructured interviews (N = 1,014 hous holds). It is noted that most Hmong parents explain their desired fami size in terms of economic conditions rather than perceived risk of chil mortality. The analysis suggests that fertility & child mortality can va independently, & that significant reductions in child mortality can b achieved without major social changes or major reductions in fertility. ¶ Data collected over 20 years from a single farmstead in northern Nige ria are drawn on to document the extreme variation in child-rearin among women of the same polygynous household, raising question about factors involved in child mortality & the social processes that mag nify that variation. The spectacle of one wife having 90% of her childre alive while her cowife has 90% dead exerts enormous influence not onl on people's beliefs, but also on their practical responses in the face of th spectre of serial child death. A high divorce rate, wide inequalities amon women, & marriage strategies that favor large, rich households are som of the consequences. Beliefs in repeatedly returning children & change lings focus blame on the children, while a premium is put on very earl diagnosis & often drastic remedial action. ¶ A behavior ecological approach is used to examine the relationship between wealth & relative reproductive success throughout the life patterns of people in four economically diverse parishes in nineteenth-century Sweden. Findings reveal: children of both sexes born to poorer parents were more likely than richer children to die or emigrate before reaching maturity; poorer men, & women whose fathers were poorer, were less likely to marry in the parish than others; & of all adults who remained in their home parish, & thus generated complete lifetime records, richer individuals had greater lifetime fertility & more children alive at age 10. Thus, wealth positively influenced reproductive success in Sweden. 4 Figures, 125 References. W. Howard (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Public debate regarding immigration & associated phenomena has persisted in Europe for many years. The role of the media, class politics, & economic factors in furthering this debate are discussed. Three postulates that contribute to public opinion on immigration are identified: (1) human sedentarity, (2) cultural "purity," & (3) citizens of a state should be privileged over noncitizens. Critical evaluation of these postulates reveal that the central problem is immigration, but the organization of the nation state as a sociopolitical system. In light of current social, economic, political, & cultural trends, an alternative system of societal & political organization is called for. 34 References. AA translated & modified by K. ¶ A study of emigration from & immigration to Switzerland from th perspective of people trying to satisfy their basic needs. From the sixteenth to the nineteenth century, Switzerland was a net producer of emigrants: from 1850-1888, about 200,000 Swiss moved to Algeria, Brazi & the US. The two world wars brought a great influx of refugees, & today 1 in 6 residents is a foreigner. Modern Switzerland owes much to immigrant contributions, & it is argued that the government should vie migration as a key element in both domestic & foreign policy. ¶ The remittance of cash & other material resources by international wage-labor migrants to their rural home communities traditionally has been viewed as having positive developmental effects, eg, reducing national balance-of-payments deficits, accelerating capital formation, financing technical improvements in peasant farming, & increasing rural incomes. Here, a historical-structural framework is employed to examine whether any of these benefits can be identified in rural Mexico through a survey of the amount of funds repatriated, the disbursements of the cash inputs, & the developmental effects of the monies received. It is argued that, despite the large amounts remitted from migrants in the US & their impact on individual well-being & social mobility, there is no positive contribution to rural Mexican economic rejuvenation. 50 References. An exploration of the parameters of illegal migration in Taiwan since 1986, drawing on field research conducted in 1989, supplemented by press & government reports. Though the use of illegal migrants has a long history in Taiwan, what is significant about the new illegal migrants is that they now work in key industrial & construction sectors rather than in services. Discussed are: the number & demographic characteristics of the illegal migrants; the views of the key players in determining government policy & legislation regarding illegal migration & the use of imported labor, including entrepreneurs, government economic & social planners, labor officials, & politicians; & the most likely form such legislation would take. As expected, labor leaders are opposed to legislation that would permit the import of foreign labor, while individual entrepreneurs favor it. Contrary to expectations, planners favor the use of foreign labor, while representatives of trade & industrial associations believe it will delay much needed industrial restructuring. In general, politicians favor any step that will continue Taiwan's economic miracle. Legislation was finally passed in Apr 1992, permitting restricted use of foreign labor. 2 Tables, 2 Appendixes, 33 References. For Ms, urbanization was the major factor determining life expectancy at birth & at age 20, & low income was the key determinant of decreased life expectancy except at age 65. For Fs, high income was the factor significantly decreasing life expectancy at age 65 in 1980, & rejuvenation of the population inversely influenced life expectancy except at birth in 1985. Sociobiologists claim that genes that code for altruistic acts toward close genetic kin can overcome selection pressures favoring self-interested behaviors. Here, it is argued that similar processes may operate in the cultural sphere. Specifically, rules that mandate beneficent acts toward people with a higher than average probability of carrying the same rule may proliferate without sanctions, even when those acts are costly to the actor. One class of rules directs beneficent behavior toward close cultural relatives, eg, cultural ancestors, descendants, siblings, & cousins, while another class directs such behavior toward those who exhibit particular cultural markers. Thus, such rules may lead to larger sets of mutual altruists than those produced by genetic processes. 48 References. Adapted from the source document. Fisher, Arthur, Sociobiology: Science or Ideology?, IM Society, 1992, 29, 5(199), July-Aug, 67-79.

¶ Sociobiology is an example of a controversial new paradigm in the natural sciences that has not been totally accepted by established (especially social) scientists owing to its debatable conclusions. Introduced to the scientific community in 1975 by Edward O. Wilson in Sociobiology: The New Synthesis, this inquiry into the biological basis for social behavior examines evolutionary biology & modern population biology. Extending the neo-Darwinian synthesis of geneticist Theodosius Dobzhansky to include ethology, sociobiology began to articulate notions such as the inclusive fitness theory, haplodiploidy, reciprocal altriusm, & kin selection. Rounding out the sociobiological paradigm was the concept of evolutionary ecology. Although it was a brilliant success in explaining animal behavior, the biological deterministic model applied to man was opposed by many researchers. The paradigm has been used to study infanticide, jurisprudence, adaptive decision making, alloparenting, & prompts for territorial behavior. J. Sadler

¶ Data collected via telephone interviews with 220 farmers & 332 nonfarmers in 8 rural NC counties in 1988/89 are used to determine the extent & sources of public opposition to the use of genetic engineering (GE) in agricultural production. A model is then developed to show how such public opposition is influenced by demographic characteristics mediated by 3 intervening variables: awareness of GE, faith in government & industry, & moral objection to GE. Moral objection is the strongest predictor of opposition, & opposition is related to lower awareness & less faith in institutions. Women are more likely to oppose GE than are men; implications of these findings are noted. 3 Tables, 32 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Neo-Darwinians have commonly been said to contradict or undermine Christian beliefs about love (agape), both as norm & as human possibility. Here, it is argued that proper understanding of agape as mutuality is compatible with human sociality, though it also transcends the latter. Theories of agape as either pure self-sacrifice or as respect for persons (impartiality), on the other hand, do find a fundamental opposition in neo-Darwinism theories of kin selection & reciprocity. Agape sublates kin & other alliances within a more universal moral perspective. 50 References. AA ¶ Described is the development of a new self-report measure of children's coping based on coping behaviors culled from previous research. The scale was administered in small-group format to 498 suburban children (primarily white & middle class) in sixth & eighth grades. Factor analysis produced 4 discrete coping categories: assistance seeking, cognitive-behavioral problem solving, cognitive avoidance, & behavioral avoidance. The factor pattern was the same across grade & gender. Test-retest reliability & internal reliability for the 4 subscales were moderate to high, & construct validity was also established. Data on grade & sex differences in coping are presented, & implications of the development studies are reviewed, & the attributes of the new scale are discussed. 6 Tables, 30 References. Emler, Nicholas (U Dundee, DD1 4HN Scotland), Childhood Origins of Beliefs about Institutional Authority, New Directions for Child Development, 1992, 56, summer, 65-77.

¶ The developmental dimensions underlying beliefs about the character & legitimacy of institutional authority are examined. By the end of elementary school, children have developed conceptions about organizational roles & institutional authority, which largely stem from their experience with the formal education system & the social transactions that occur within it. At this age, awareness of organizational roles & context is largely intuitive, & group differences associated with class, culture, & type of formal education occur. Beliefs about institutional authority involve understanding of moral, objective, & logical relations, & are related to stages of cognitive & moral development. 20 References. D. ¶ An experimental investigation of the effects of a holistic creativity program on self-concept & cognitive/affective creativity. Two classes of third-grade children (total N = 43) from a public school in Philadelphia, Pa, were pretested to determine initial levels of self-concept, cognitive creativity, & affective creativity. One of the classes then participated in a 1-hour weekly, 12-week-long intervention of creative, multimodal (multisensory) activities integrating art, drama, movement, & sound. Posttesting revealed that the experimental group scored significantly higher on the measure of self-concept than did the control group, & significantly higher on the posttest than on the pretest for the elaboration measure of cognitive creativity. There were also significant gender effects. Possible explanations for the results are suggested, new hypotheses raised, & avenues offered for further research. 3 Tables, 28 References. ¶ Data obtained during clinical interviews with 12-year-old Icelandic children (N = 73 in Reykjavik, & 21 in a small farming village) are drawn on to explore the influence of social class, community type, & teacher ratings on children's self-descriptions. Responses were assigned to one of four content categories: physical (appearance & possessions), active (abilities & activities), social (social personality & realtionships), or psychological (thoughts & feelings). Results indicate that children in the higher social classes offer more psychological descriptors than do those in the lower social classes. Children rated as intellectually & socially competent by their teachers described themselves more often in social terms. There is little evidence for an independent effect of community type on configurations of content in self-understanding. 2 Tables, 26 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ One of the more far-reaching changes in the Israeli kibbutz in recent years, affecting both parental contributions to productivity & the functional ability of the communal setting, has been the move from collective sleeping arrangements for children to family sleeping arrangements. Here, survey data collected in 1986 are used to compare attitudes toward work & leisure among 162 parents (83 females [Fs] & 79 males [Ms]) from kibbutzim with family sleeping arrangements & 225 parents (126 Fs & 99 Ms) from kibbutzim with communal sleeping arrangements. ANOVAs showed no significant relationship between work & leisure attitudes of parents & the type of child sleeping arrangements, nor did work or leisure attitudes differ between Ms & Fs of the same sleeping arrangement. However, substantial work & leisure behavioral differences existed when Ms & Fs & when sleeping arrangements were compared. In the communal setting, Fs were more punctual at work, had less interesting work, & were less active in leisure behaviors than Fs in the familial setting. Ms in the communal setting differed from Ms in the familial setting on all 6 work behavior items & 4 out of 15 leisure behavior items. The work & leisure behaviors of Ms & Fs within the same sleeping arrangement differed significantly in ways that indicate gender equality has not been achieved in the kibbutz. 2 Tables, 31 References. ¶ Many studies of political learning have identified the family, media, & peer group as the primary agents in the socialization process. Findings of a 10-year longitudinal study (1976-1986), involving 1,040 Chicanos in the southwestern US, indicate that, for Chicano youth (as well as other ethnic minorities), the family, school, media, & peer group are secondary agents in the development of political attitudes. The primary agent of attitude formation, & ultimately socialization, is the local social order & its outgrowth, the local political culture. 35 References. ¶ Scales of parental perceived risk of childhood injury are developed, exploring social class differences in perceptions of risk & how this links to behaviors related to child safety. The scales are based on theories from cognitive psychology, as well as information from previous studies in sociology & health that relate to child safety, & contain dimensions of seriousness & likelihood of injuries (eg, bruises, cuts) & seriousness & likelihood of hazards (eg, stairs, bathtubs). For both injuries & hazards, perceived risk was a multiplicative function of perceived likelihood X perceived seriousness. Results of an interview survey of 204 parents of young children reveal that both perceived risk of injuries & of hazards were significant predictors of self-reported safety behaviors. Inclusion of sociodemographic & child attribute variables in regression analyses did not diminish the explanatory power of the perceived risk variables. Results also show that mothers in low-income families perceived more injury-related dangers for their children. 5 Tables, 35 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Based on a family-systems approach, the relationship between parents' teaching strategies & children's intellectual ability is explored in 86 families with a (target) child age 6, 44 of whom have been diagnosed as communication handicapped (CH) & currently enrolled in an intervention program. Correlational & path-analytic procedures support the hypothesis that family dynamics will be altered in families with a CH child, ie, the child's ability level will be even more strongly related to the parents' teaching strategies & siblings' contribution will be diminished. 1 Table, 2 Figures, 37 References. ¶ Data from the 1981 Time Use Longitudinal Panel Study (N = 492 children ages 3-18), supplemented by teacher/parent reports, are drawn on to investigate factors influencing time spent in leisure activities (LAs). Analysis reveals that more time is spent in unstructured than structured LAs. Analysis of variance yields result on the influence of child, mother, & socioeconomic characteristics, & finds that: males spend significantly more time than do females (Fs) in active sports, playing games, & passive leisure, especially watching TV on weekends, while Fs spend significantly more time socializing on weekends. The amount of time spent socializing increases with age, but decreases with employment. Time spent playing games decreases with age, increases with number of children, & decreases with increases in family income. Given the large number of children who do not participate in leisure activities, it is suggested that future research explore the probability of participation. 7 Tables, 1 Appendix, 44 References. ¶ To explore how & when culture-specific meaning systems (MSs) are acquired as part of the developmental process, repeated semistructured interviews at various intervals were conducted 1976-1979 with 72 Japanese mother-child pairs living in Los Angeles, Calif, to investigate how they incorporated US MSs over time. It is found that the majority of Japanese children who learn a certain amount of English, have friends among Americans, & stay for at least 3 years can successfully incorporate US MSs & act accordingly while they live in the US. Some of them internalize US MSs about interpersonal relationships so deeply that, on their return to Japan, they are no longer comfortable with Japanese ways. Stepwise regression analyses with 7 variables reveal the importance of age-related factors. There is a sensitive period for the incorporation of a cultural MS related to interpersonal relationships among peers outside of a child's own family. This sensitive period, during which cultural meanings acquire the power to activate the affective system, appears to be during ages 9-15. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, 32 References. Modified AA

¶ The development of the Act for Better Child Care Services in the late 1980s is traced. It is suggested that the modifications of this proposal through the legislative process, & the particular strategies that brought about these modifications, created a final version that has an uneven impact on women situated differently with respect to child care needs. This was particularly evident in terms of who was to receive benefits under the legislation, the manner in which the distribution of benefits was implemented, & the implications of a reliance on standards for quality control in child care. 45 References. ¶ Following the administration of a loneliness scale to a sample of 876 children in kindergarten through fourth-grade, data on family structure, maternal employment, & afterschool care were obtained on a subsample of 582 children, & a sociometric rating scale was administered to a subsample of 354 children. Results reveal a significant difference in loneliness between popular & rejected children. A 2(age level) x 2(school socioeconomic status [SES]) x 2(sex) x 3(reading level) ANOVA indicates that age affected loneliness, with older children reporting loneliness to a greater extent than younger ones. Those from lower SES schools did not differ in loneliness. Reading level also influenced loneliness, with superior readers being least lonely. A 3(family structure) x 2(maternal employment) x 4(afterschool care) ANOVA indicates that children in two- & single-parent families were less lonely than children in other configurations. Maternal employment had no effect. Children who went home to mothers after school or to organized afterschool daycare programs did not differ from each other, but did differ from latchkey children & those with other types of afterschool care. 2 Tables, 29 References. ¶ Stanley N. Kurtz's assessment of the Oedipus complex in the Trobriands ("Polysexualization: A New Approach to Oedipus in the Trobriands" [see SA 39:4/91X8312]) is examined. Kurtz suggests that polysexualization changes the universal Oedipus complex into a more complex culturally specific structure. However, his analysis of the baloma beliefs & the yausa & Kaytalugi tales does not support his hypotheses on the role of polysexualization in severing the boy's libinal tie to his mother & raises serious questions of the libidinal ties he postulates between father & daughter & between siblings. Kurtz's failure to discuss the transformation of the Trobriand boy's relations to this father & the development of the conventional Oedipus complex in the Trobriand girls is a serious omission. 5 References. ¶ Analysis of inventory data obtained from a sample of 361 female & 339 male adolescents, ages 11-17, in Kwara State, Nigeria, reveal initial pubertal problems (menarche & spermarche) were experienced differentially according to socioeconomic status (SES) & gender. Boys with low SES experienced more physical problems than those with high SES, & low-SES adolescents experienced more health problems than high-SES adolescents. Gender was an important factor in the experience of psychosocial problems. Ms & Fs did not differ on desire for control, but Ms scored higher than Fs on expression of control. Fs scored much higher than Ms on desired & expressed affection. Ms valued control expressed highest & affection desired lowest; Fs ranked affection desired as highest & control expressed as lowest. In general, Fs were more willing to initiate inclusion behavior in relationships than control behavior, but were equally receptive to inclusion & control behaviors from others. ¶ The association between attachment & identity among late adolescents was examined through completion of questionnaires measuring attachment to mothers & fathers, family background, identity status, & life satisfaction by 127 male & 141 female late adolescents. Identity achievement was found to be related to attachment to the mother but unrelated to attachment to the father, though both were associated with lower moratorium & lower diffusion. Life satisfaction was related to father bonds, identity achievement, & lower moratorium. The secure base provided by attachments to mothers & fathers acts as a protective factor against the inability to make commitments. Mother bonds also appear to support the resolution of identity crises & the formation of authentic commitments. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 40 References. Adapted from the source document.

The link between residence & adjustment was indirect & mediated by differences in closeness & monitoring by the residential parent. ¶ An in-depth, critical review of contemporary theories & explanations of the high rates of adolescent pregnancy & childbearing in the US, examining the strengths & weaknesses of 6 most prominent explanations in light of current research. The success of health, school, & government programs designed to deal with adolescent pregnancy is in large part contingent on the theoretical assumptions on which these programs are based. The experience of immigration influenced perceptions of parental control & involvement but not warmth. Nonimmigrant youth reported at least as many emotional & physical symptoms as immigrant youth. ¶ While the initial reaction of many troubled adolescents placed in group homes is to reject help, this is an accumulated result of their deprivation & suffering. The helping relationship between these youth & counselors is based on affective interaction influenced by the institutional arrangement, & becomes a reeducative process in the group home. Interviews with 56 counselors at youth rehabilitation centers in Quebec reveal that variations in the counselor's job status, gender, & duties, as well as social links between counselors, house rules, & limits to legal intervention, all contribute to the effectiveness of rehabilitation. A greater margin of freedom & resources available to the center staff generally spell higher quality involvement, more positive job attitudes, & greater desire to further their career. 32 References. ¶ In Israeli kibbutzim, 5 sequential substages comprise "youth," ie, the stage between graduation from high school at age 18 & adulthood in the late 20s or early 30s: voluntary social service, 2-4 years of military service, 1-2 years of temporary work on the kibbutz, a 1-2 year leave of absence from the kibbutz, & 2-4 years of college. These substages coalesce into a structure of liminal & moratorial states, characterized by temporal performance of social roles, "liminality" between two clearly-defined states, & role moratorium. During the youth period on the kibbutz, the personal & social orientation is individualistic, nonmaterialistic, expressive, & exploratory. The achievement of personal identification within a collectivist society in light of the security of status within this society is a special task for kibbutz youth, & is accentuated by the communal presence in the individual's work, family, & residence. The kibbutz establishment, by allowing the youth to maintain a marginal role in the kibbutz during this period, encourages an extended moratorium, which prolongs the youth's decision to leave the kibbutz. 85 References. ¶ Inventory & scale data are drawn on to investigate security of attachment & level of individuation from parents & peers in a sample of 126 undergraduates at a large northeastern university, 42 with a history of suicidality (ideation or attempt), 42 currently depressed with no history of suicidality, & 42 normal controls. As predicted, Ss with a history of suicidality exhibited both the lowest security of attachment & the least degree of individuation in their current relationships with parents. In contrast, they were similar to depressed & control students on security of peer attachment & level of individuation from peers. Ss with a history of suicidality rated their parents & mother as emotionally absent in childhood to a significantly higher degree than did depressed & normal controls; this effect was independent of depression, but not of gender. History of suicidality was more strongly associated with family instability than with parental divorce. It is concluded that parental absence as emotionally available attachment figures at a time when such availability is critical heightens adolescents' vulnerability to suicide. 7 Tables, 48 References. ¶ Interview data from a sample of 376 males (Ms) & 397 females (Fs) ages 10-16 from 418 families in a southwestern US city are drawn on to investigate the influence of pubertal status, pubertal timing, & chronological age on adolescent heterosexual experience & delinquency. Hierarchical regression analyses revealed that for F, pubertal status predicted delinquency & sexual experience independently of age. In Ms, the evidence of independent pubertal effects was weaker. Separate analyses of pubertal timing indicated that both M & F early maturers reported engaging in more sexual activity & delinquent behavior than late maturers. Results are discussed in terms of a psychosocial expectations model that includes pubertal effects in explanations of adolescent behavior. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 41 References. ¶ Data obtained via inventory & questionnaire instruments are used to examine psychological adjustment among 123 female (F) & 42 male (M) Japanese teenagers, scheduled for a foreign exchange program in the US. Multiple regressions show that, for Fs, the lower the maternal care & the stronger the maternal overprotection, the higher the neuroticism. For Ms, maternal overprotection & neuroticism were correlated. The hypothesis that parental rearing practices directly influence psychiatric status was not supported. The support for this hypothesis in previous research may be due to a Berkson bias, or to the high extrovert skew in this sample. 4 Tables, 14 References. Adapted with permission from Academic Press.

¶ Interview data from 50 Asian children, ages 13-15, from 3 multicultural schools in West Midlands, England, are used to investigate their views on a variety of personal, social, & educational matters. The children's stated preferences (language, fashion, music, TV, school work) suggest that bicultural identities are being formed: most have adopted some British norms, while many retain at least some key elements from their own cultures (most notably, language & religious practices). Differences were also detected; eg, Muslims were found to be more religiously oriented than Hindu or Sikh children. The relationship between these & previous findings is discussed. 15 Tables, 18 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The relationship between peer social support & psychological symptomatology is examined through correlational analyses of survey data collected at 4 points between the end of grade 6 & the end of grade 8 from 143 early adolescents in the midwestern US. Because statistically significant prospective effects for peer support are found only for the specific period of transition to junior high school, while effects for symptoms are more numerous & of longer duration, it is reasoned that interaction among support, stress, & mental health might differ over time. Implications for the timing of preventive interventions are discussed. 2 Tables, 1 Figure, 42 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Questionnaire data obtained in 1988 are used to explore the relation of alcohol & drug use during sexual activity to increased HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) risk-associated behavior in a sample of 108 inner-city black male adolescents in Philadelphia, Pa. Results show that respondents who reported a greater number of days in which they had sex while "high" reported more unprotected coitus, a greater number of coital partners (including risky partners), & more frequent insertive & anal intercourse than did those who reported fewer days on which they had sex while high. For the most part, these relations remained significant when total frequency of sex, a correlate of having sex while high, was included in the regression equation; the only exception was failure to use condoms. 3 Tables, 45 References. Using data from intensive interviews with 81 students at a small midwestern high school, & from off- & on-campus observation, the impact of school activities, school social structure, & peer culture on the self-perceptions of nerds is delineated. Findings indicate that adolescents who were unpopular in middle school, but then became involved in high school activities & friendship groups, were able to recover by becoming self-confident & reconstructing themselves as "normal" within a changing school social system. 73 References. The Rise of an Autonomous Youth Culture in Belgium and the Netherlands), Sociologische Gids, 1992, 39, 5-6, Sept-Dec, 384-399. (DUT)

¶ A contrastive analysis is presented of the rise of autonomous youth cultures in Belgium & Netherlands, 1955-1965. In both countries, this phenomenon is often explained in terms of the emergence of a new leisure market. However, it is argued that the modern consumer mentality is a cultural solution to daily problems brought on by the rationalization of the social system rather than by consumer greed. The cultural form of the new mentality was slightly different for the two countries. In the Netherlands, a weakening of the pillarization system was observed, while in Belgium, youth culture adapted more to existing pillarized structures. Thus, the developmental differences depended largely on the modality of professional attention surrounding the youth. Future research should emphasize issues of professionalization. 45 References. Characteristics of respondents (Rs) who had communicated with parents about sexuality issues were also examined. While most Rs did not think they were likely to become infected with HIV, a majority of sexually active Rs had tried to avoid exposure, 50% by using condoms. Other findings suggest that communication with parents may play a positive role in the healthy sexual socialization of youth. ¶ Questionnaire data obtained annually since 1979/80 from 118 college students in Kelowna, British Columbia, reveal that they choose among 3 sexual subcultures: celibacy, monogamy, & free experimentation. There has been some shift away from casual sex toward committed partnerships, but the basic outlines of this sexual "plural society" have remained unchanged since 1980. Despite AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome), most students have not adopted careful sexual practices, either in number of partners or use of condoms. Other North American statistics suggest that this pattern is typical of most colleges & universities throughout Canada, although students on many US campuses have become more careful. Also explored are reasons behind sexual choices, & whether the possibility of contracting AIDS will eventually lead adolescents to better balance their needs for sex, love, freedom, & self-preservation. Working against caution, unfortunately, is the fact that sexual expression is an important element of becoming an adult in Western cultures. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 33 References. ¶ Data from a Hispanic civilian subsample of the National Longitudinal Survey of Youth (N = 849 US-born & 312 foreign-born Mexican Americans ages 14-21) are drawn on to investigate how aggregate socioeconomic indicators for this population vary by birthplace. Analysis indicates that, depending on the indicator, problems are often compounded for foreign-born youth, though the unfavorable status of Mexican Americans is not exclusive to the foreign-born. Indeed, 20% of the US-born youth fail to complete high school, 25% are unemployed, & 20% live in a poverty-income household. Overall, results indicate that adolescents with cancer are relatively well-adjusted, although they exhibit a less positive social/sexual self-image than do their healthy peers. Several differences emerge when the relationship between stressors appraised as most difficult to deal with & perceived social support are examined: patients dealing with stress related to family & interpersonal relationships perceive relatively higher levels of social support than do healthy adolescents, who perceive greater social support in the face of stressors related to external demands. Sport-by-sport comparisons & the gender-role orientation of As are also examined. Results indicate that (A) As are more likely than NAs to possess certain behavioral & psychological correlates of eating disorders; (B) there are few differences among the various sport teams, & (C) gender-role orientation is generally not a critical variable. ¶ Questionnaire data were used to examine the relative influence of best friends & social crowds of older adolescents on cigarette smoking. Differences in influence were also investigated as a function of sex, conformity, or the mutuality of the friendship. Using a longitudinal design that enabled the separation of the effects of peer influence from those of selective association, the results showed that social crowds differed in mean level of cigarette smoking, with burnouts smoking the most & jock/preps smoking the least. The majority of best friendships were homogeneous for social crowd. Best friend influence predicted change in cigarette smoking over a 1-year period, while social crowd influence appeared to be minimal. Conformity was positively related to susceptibility to peer influence, although mutuality of the friendship & sex of the S were not. 2 Tables, 32 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Survey data are used to analyze the likelihood of participation in premarital sexual intercourse among 754 never-married female students enrolled in a midwestern residential university. Using axiomatic theory construction, 48 empirical propositions concerning premarital sexual intercourse were tested, 19 of which were found to be statistically significant. Three derived propositions were reformulated from these findings, which in turn were utilized to develop 2 middle-range theories: commitment theory & cultural milieu theory. These theories clearly demonstrate the role of changing personal & societal attitudes toward sexuality & perceived partner commitment in the decision to become sexually active. 1 Table, 1 Appendix, 89 References. ¶ Questionnaire & interview data are drawn on to explore hypothesized linkages between gender identity disorder & courtship disorder in a sample of 274 heterosexual male patients of the following types: nontransvestic fetishists for female attire; transvestic fetishists; patients with gender identity disorder of adolescence & adulthood, nontranssexual type; & transsexuals. Of these patients, 53 had also demonstrated 1 or more putative expressions of courtship disorder. The proportion that each type contributed to the total group of 53 patients with courtship disorder was compared with the same type's proportional contribution to the group of 221 without a courtship disorder. Analysis revealed that the transvestic fetishists contributed a significantly larger % & the transsexuals a significantly smaller % of individuals to the group with a courtship disorder than to those without a courtship disorder; theoretical implications of this asymmetry are discussed. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 20 References. ¶ An analysis of 274 centerfolds in Playboy magazine, 1954-1989, was conducted to explore changes in the average age of the models, & whether centerfolds depicting older women represent a significant change in perceptions of the erotic. It was found that women who appeared 1981-1989 were significantly older than those appearing 1954-1980. It is suggested that, as the US population ages, older women will be perceived as sexier. The "aging of desire" is deemed a fruitful domain for gerontological research. 2 Tables, 2 Figures, 7 References. I. Shagrir

¶ An interpretation of love relationships that accounts for their uniqueness in the realm of other social relationships builds on the social & contextualized rather than individual experience of love. A content analysis of approximately 2,000 love letters written 1860-1988 in Quebec reveals that the changing social experience of love has contributed to a modern notion of the individual. These transformations redefine love relationships in terms of paradoxes, reflecting the contradictory agendas set initially by the family, then the church, the couple, & most recently, the individual. 24 References. King, C. Richard, To Have or Not to Have Sex in Critical Theory: Sexuality in the Early Writings of Wilhelm Reich and Erich Fromm, UM Mid-American Review of Sociology, 1992, 16, 2, spring, 81-91.
¶ To explore the relationship between society & sexuality, which is overlooked in the later phases of critical theory, the role of sexuality in the writings of Wilhelm Reich & Erich Fromm is explored. Reich uniformly celebrates & strategically deploys sexuality to critique Western capitalistic society while Fromm lacks a clear & consistent utilization of sexuality. Reich uses the theories of Karl Marx in his predominately Freudian framework of sexual repression in trying to address the problem of repression & suppression in Western capitalism. Fromm, on the other hand, puts the theories of Sigmund Freud into his Marxist approach to authority, the family, & ideology. Theodor W. Adorno, Herbert Marcuse, & Max Horkheimer largely ignored sexuality in their later writings, but instead used Freudian concepts in their theory of the authoritarian personality. 17 References. ¶ While some have maintained that heterosexual interaction with gays would increase homophobia, others believe the opposite. Questionnaire data were collected from heterosexual students at a southeastern metropolitan university who had 3 hours of contact with gay males & females & others who had not experienced contact (N = 102 & 126, respectively). Interaction between gays & heterosexuals focused on questions heterosexuals raised about the gay lifestyle & myths about homosexuality. Interaction was found to be associated with lower homophobia, providing support for contact theory. 2 Tables, 21 References. ¶ A sociological examination of second-time love highlights some of the inherent contradictions & ambiguities in building a new love relationship. It is noted that the affective component of a new social relationship in which at least one partner will be a stepparent involves vaguely defined roles. For the new couple, living together requires a choice of whose home to reside in. The option to have another child also potentially redefines the relationship. The mutual adaptation of partners in this unique bond requires each to protectively & proactively model their behavior, thereby deflating the passionate impact of love. While the joy of being in love seems to detract from conjugal stability, paradoxically, it also leads to a wiser, more regular form of love. 31 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Questionnaire data from a sample of 394 sexually active, heterosexual, unmarried young Asian-/African-American, Hispanic, & white students ages 18-25 at southern Calif universities are drawn on to examine their perceptions of the effectiveness of partner questioning in reducing HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) risk & the extent to which they employ the technique. Results indicate that both males (Ms) & females (Fs) expect others, particularly Ms, to minimize HIV risk histories. Ethnic differences are also evident, with African-American & Hispanic youth anticipating more frequent risk minimization. Despite this knowledge, a substantial proportion of young adults use partner questioning to reduce their HIV risk. Fs who do so report less frequent condom use compared to other Fs. 1 Table, 36 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Interview data obtained from a community sample in 1985 & 1988 (N = 1,755, dropping to 1,455, middle-income-level adults, mean age 42) were used to analyze frequency determinants of marital disagreements. Typical frequency of disagreements was once or twice per month, & remained stable in couples married 3+ years. Significant associations were found between children & disagreement frequency. Length of marriage & disagreement frequency were inversely related. Frequency was lower in remarried couples. Personality had the most powerful impact on marital satisfaction, with neuroticism, social extroversion, & mastery the most typical determinants of marital distress. 4 Tables. ¶ Data collected via case studies, participant observation, & a review of Thai language media & texts since 1972 are drawn on to investigate female (F) prostitution in contemporary lowland Buddhist Thai society. It is argued that the simultaneous rapid growth of prostitution as a lucrative sex industry & of the Thai economy as an emerging newly industrialized country have, paradoxically, enabled F prostitutes to conserve the basic institutions of society. This has occurred at a time when landlessness, rampant commercialism, & poverty have threatened the survival of traditional lifeways among the majority rural agricultural population. Prostitution, although illegal, has flourished partly because it enables Fs, through remittances home & merit-making activities, to fulfill traditional cultural functions of daughters, conserving the institutions of family & village-level Buddhism, as well as of government. 2 Tables. ¶ Described is a nationwide political movement launched by the Communist Party & then enlarged by the government of the People's Republic of China since 1989 called "sweeping away the yellow subjects" ("yellow" meaning erotic & pornographic as does "blue" in the US). Almost all written, audio, & visual publications describing any kind of sexual behavior were banned, & their publishers were punished by arrest. At least 20 persons were put to death for selling yellow subjects. The Party & government launched the movement based on the contention that yellow subjects result in readers & viewers becoming sexual offenders. Here, questionnaires returned by a sample of 1,610 visitors to an 1988/89 exhibition of nude oil paintings in Beijing & Shanghai are drawn on to explore the number & type of persons accepting 3 kinds of publications on sexuality: scientific books, erotic literature, & visual materials. The type & degree of influence of such materials on readers' & viewers' attitudes toward other subjects that were not directly sexual are also investigated. Results suggest the beginnings of a sexual revolution in China in 1988. 5 Tables, 1 Reference. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

= 54, 24, & 61, respectively) in inner-city Melbourne, Australia, regarding their engagement in gender-conforming (masculine) & gender-nonconforming (feminine) behaviors as children revealed that adult sexual orientation was predicted as accurately by both types of behaviors. However, childhood scripts as recalled by homosexual men were considerably more diverse: 22 reported having experienced few, if any, gender-conforming behaviors & most, if not all, gender-nonconforming behaviors; but 18 had the same profile as heterosexual men (high probability of masculine behaviors & low probability of feminine behaviors). ¶ Anonymous mail questionnaire data are drawn on to investigate sexual identity formation among women self-identified as lesbian (N = 346) or bisexual (N = 60). Analysis reveals that, on average, bisexuals come out at later ages & exhibit less stable identity histories. However, variations in identity history among lesbians & bisexuals overshadow the differences between them, & suggest that coming out is not a linear, goal-oriented, developmental process. It is concluded that sexual identity formation must be reconceptualized as a process of describing one's social location within a changing social context. Changes in sexual identity are, therefore, expected of mature individuals as they maintain an accurate description of their position vis-à-vis other individuals, groups, & institutions. 2 Tables, 3 Figures, 59 References. ¶ The modern definition of marriage includes notions dating to the medieval era of courtly love. The emotion of love is an authentic but fragile reality that unites two people. Since it is a necessary condition of marriage, the risky potential for separation or disunion obliges the couple to cement its authenticity. While this mutual commitment requires ongoing personal investment, it also produces psychological & social profits for the individual. The social contruction of identity by adults within the family aims at forming genuine & disinterested interrelationships tested by family life. The key emotion of love operates logically in the family & becomes a sign of social competence. 21 References. Adapted from the source document.

Beliefs surveyed using a 4-point Likert-type scale included: communication, adolescent birth control & pregnancy & responsibilty for it, intercourse, abortion, pornography, & masturbation. ¶ Instead of the US Census Bureau's definition of family (as coresident persons related by blood, marriage, or adoption), or the alternative concept that any type of relationship can constitute a family, middle-range definitions of the family are proposed for specific contexts. In the caretaking of an elderly disabled person, eg, the government's concern is to conceptualize the family in terms of concrete behavioral aspects of care & responsibility. Along with the census definition, the state has unfortunately adopted an either/or model for caretaking, ie, either the family or the state has the entire responsibility for care. This type of social control promotes the illusion of family self-sufficiency, but will not work effectively unless there is social integration, because the family is truly dependent on the larger society. A more fluid definition of family for the purposes of caretaking of the elderly is recommended that includes both non- & distant kin. 49 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ In most Western countries, policies of community care have looked to the family & its networks as the major supplier of services to those with disabilities. These policies ignore the evidence that the support available in modern local communities is limited. It is proposed that caregiving work further isolates family members from neighbors & friends, a hypothesis supported by the literature by exploring the nature of friendship networks & neighbor support. Empirical evidence available from an Australian study of 73 mothers who cared for their children disabled by either cerebral palsy or spina bifida further support it. Findings show that their friendships were often strained or severed after the birth of the disabled child. The reciprocity that had characterized the relationships previously could no longer be maintained. The constraints posed by the need to give constant supervision to their children limited the mothers' social activities. The norms that govern neighbor relationships (especially the norm of maintaining privacy) militated against help with most tasks of caregiving. Kin networks were sometimes also disrupted by caregiving, although they were more robust than those of neighborhood & those based on friendship. Informal community structures thus appear to provide only minimal help with the tending tasks required to support the dependency needs of children with disabilities. 44 References. Modified AA

¶ Discussed is whether the efforts of the fascist regime in Italy succeeded in subjugating women by reestablishing traditional male norms, centering discussion within the context of changing family roles in the northern Milan region. It is shown that, due to increased industrialization, women were forced to work outside the home to supplement agricultural income. Although initially viewed as demeaning, such nonfarm work gradually gained acceptance as more men were forced into industrial work. This transition from agriculture to industry produced attitudes that opposed the limitation of women's roles. Although the fascists opposed such progress, the necessity of women's work outside the home left them powerless to stop these developments. 35 References. Modified AA

¶ To investigate the relationship between parent-adolescent communication & D. H. Olson's "Circumplex Model VII: Validation Studies and Faces III" (Family Process, 1986, 25), the Family Cohesion & Adaptability Scale & the Parent-Adolescent Communication Test were administered to 100 normally functioning Italian families with adolescent children. Analysis reveals differences in how different generations view their family's cohesion, adaptability, & communication. Teenagers' gender is shown to be an important factor in comprehending differences between communication patterns of both mothers & fathers with teenagers. A higher index of family dissatisfction is observed in families with daughters, possibly due to changes in sex roles & resultant conflicts. Also discussed are the differences between real & ideal families & between positive & negative forms of communication. 5 Tables, 37 References. M. Meeks

David, Elaine (Virginia Polytechnic Instit & State U, Blacksburg 24061), Sociology to Famology: A Wise Move?, Journal of Family Issues, 1993, 14, 1, Mar, 20-34.

¶ Advocates of the new discipline of "famology" stress the unique qualities of the family as exemplified in certain differentiating characteristics of the family realm. It is contended here that when these characteristics are examined in the light of recent research by other family scientists, they appear to disregard negative aspects of family life, present stereotypical roles for both male & female family members, & minimize significant aspects of the interface between families & other societal institutions & organizations. In light of diverse & complex family needs, judging the wisdom of a move to famology should include careful consideration of the characteristics of the family realm offered by the new discipline. Famology proponents' inordinate uneasiness with "borrowed" theory & their emphasis on a private-public dichotomy as a given in the study of the family should also be challenged. 50 References. According to the ABCD-XYZ model, crisis/stress management involves: (A) perceiving the stressor, the demands of the situation; (B) cognitive coping & managerial decision making to create, use, or combine coping resources; & (C) activating those decisions through adaptive coping & management behavior. 1 Figure, 37 References. ¶ After presenting evidence that laws of marriage & divorce designed to create sex neutrality of rules have not resulted in sex neutrality of economic outcomes, several policies for improving economic outcomes for wives are examined, including: divorce insurance against loss of earning capacity; loss of expected standard of living or loss of spousal services; divorce-contingent pay for homemaking services; & extension of equal asset sharing on divorce to changes in earning capacity. The latter is the system most consistent with the concept underlying contemporary Canadian family law, ie, that of marriage as an all-encompassing economic partnership. Arguably, it is also consistent with the goals of equity & efficiency. 17 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Previous research on the causes of alienation among merchant seamen & familial management techniques is extended by identifying the factors that mitigate worker alienation & that determine the success or failure of particular familial management strategies. Alienation scores of 111 merchant seamen/fathers collected 1981-1987 were matched with particular familial management strategies. Results indicate that, of the 4 familial management strategies typically employed among merchant seamen (conflictual authority, replacement, contingent authority, & periodic guest), the lowest mean alienation score was associated with the replacement strategy & the highest with the contingent authority strategy. The periodic guest strategy, on the other hand, was the one most frequently adopted. 2 Tables, 1 Appendix, 34 References. M. Maguire

¶ Sources of life satisfaction among grandparents are explored, including satisfaction derived from the grandparent role, other familial roles, & sociodemographic variables, based on survey data from 252 grandparents. Findings reveal that both the grandparent role & other familial roles are important determinants of life satisfaction, but that two direct measures of the grandparent role are the strongest predictors: time spent with grandchildren, & relationship with grandchildren. Also moderately correlated with life satisfaction are health, number of grandchildren, number of children, & marital status. Because the data indicate that a grandparent's other relationships often assume less importance than that with the grandchild, it is suggested that a "new grandparent" might well be on the sociological horizon–one more essentially a part of the extended nuclear family–& that researchers must begin to explore the implications of such a transition. 2 Tables, 34 References. ¶ Interviews were conducted with a sample of 111 older (median age 56) & 206 younger (median age 33) divorced persons (predominantly Caucasian & Mormon) to compare their reasons for divorce. Results indicate an association of reasons to developmental issues, ie, "grew apart" for older persons & "irresponsibility of spouse" for younger persons. Statistically significant differences between the older group are gender related. Traditional male-identified issues of infidelity & physical & substance abuse continue into old age. Older persons may accept a lack of intimacy & infidelities for 15 to 44 years, & yet are determined to fulfill their needs. The social processes & descriptive conditions through which meaning is established, managed, & transcended are discussed, highlighting both the descriptive utilities & the limits of organizationally embedded discourses. Ethnographic data are presented to demonstrate how family, although discursively & interactionally constituted, is a local enactment of practical reasoning substantively bounded by local culture yet offering grounds for resistance. Analytic orientations & strategies for examining family discourse & meaning in organizational context are proffered. 41 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The fact that there are no families in conventional family research is an omission owing to the epistemology of family research, which allows unitizing the phenomena in terms of individual units, which are then aggregated into relational properties. Because of this, conventional research is destined to miss the complexity of interaction in the dynamics of intimate relations, particularly emotion. Discovering a broader range of the phenomena of intimacy, including emotions, is possible by focus on nonsummative properties of intimate relations. In practical terms, this is possible if: (1) dyads are the minimum unit of analysis, (2) action/reaction is the minimum interaction unit, & (3) continuous time is observed. This grounds within-case analysis to develop general constructs as a precursor to across-case analysis. 1 Figure, 29 References. Hierarchical regression analysis reveals that individuality of husbands affected work outcomes after taking into account wives' college-age goals, young adult personality, & duration of marriage. Conjoint high-low patterns of individuality in 34 couples were associated with different schematic work stories, which revealed distinctive personality & relational correlates at age 27. ¶ Structured interview & time chart data collected 1977/78 from 291 homemakers in 2-child Calif households are drawn on to investigate variations in time use among single-parent, one-earner, & two-earner families, & to assess the effects of two covariates–age of younger child & hours of employment of the homemaker–on total family time spent on household tasks. ANCOVA revealed that the greatest discrepancy between 1- & 2-parent families is that the former spent significantly less time on home/yard maintenance & on nonphysical care (social interaction with family members). One-earner families spend almost as much time as 2-earner families on nonphysical care, but only when secondary time was included. Two household activities–clothing care & management–were not affected by either family type or the covariates. 3 Tables, 31 References. Adapted from the source document. Hutchings, Nancy (Southern Connecticut State U, New Haven 06515), Family Violence, Peace Review, 1992, 4, 3, fall, 24-27.

¶ In the US, the most violent place is the home. There is a documented increase in wife battering, child abuse, & even murders stemming from domestic violence, & most experts say family violence is underreported. In 1968, all states mandated the reporting of child abuse, yet private doctors continue protecting their patients. Historical traditions supported beating wives & children, & churches supported the belief that a man's home was his castle–his wife & children were his property, & his power came from his financial control. While no longer supported by church or law, men still maintain control. Women generally work in secondary positions or the nurturing professions, often subordinate to male executives. Economics still keep women in a position where they remain victims of family violence, & government programs to help them are inadequate. A major shift is needed in political & economic institutions to outlaw domestic violence & enable its victims to become free & independent. ¶ Since the time of Ferdinand Töunies, sociology has widely accepted the opposition between affectivity & rationality. But the complete sociological analysis of everyday life must account for the affective dimensions of social experience, its most pervasive component. Instead of pitting rationality against affectivity, an opposition is proposed between instrumental rationality, abstractly concerned with logical connections between means & ends, & contextual rationality, reflecting an intrinsic or subjective logic. Applying this framework to the affective aspect of matrimonial relationships, it is noted that there are rational ways in which marriage & cohabitation differ. An affective rationality gives domestic duties their special meaning in the married household. 8 References. Adapted from the source document. In both environments, the longer a project has been in existence, the greater the number of volunteers in service. Further, the unmet need for family caregiver services, ie, the number of referrals unserved by the project, is considerably greater in rural areas. ¶ By the end of 1991, Croatia introduced special legislation to accommodate & protect elderly citizens displaced by the war for independence from Yugoslavia; one means was to house them with other families. Analysis of questionnaire data from a sample of displaced elderly (N = 30 age 60+) & from their host families shows that rural households were frequently chosen because they could accept not only people but also farm animals & equipment salvaged from the war zone. Accommodation by other families as a form of protection for the elderly & the ill has been a standard practice of social work for many years. It is thought that this arrangement helps the old people to reorganize their lives in a manner reducing psychophysical stress. Also investigated is the adaptation of the host families to their new guests. 9 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Recently available data drawn from the 1910 census manuscripts are used to document sharp racial differences in family & household structure at the turn of the century. Findings reveal that, compared with whites, African-American households were less likely to be nuclear & more likely to be headed by women. Further, African-American women were much more likely than white women to have surviving children who were not living with them at the time of the census. Because such historical differences parallel contemporary ones, greater attention to persistent structural, cultural, & demographic factors that affect racial differences in family structure is urged. 9 Tables, 73 References. ¶ In an investigation of British unemployment & the associated domestic crisis, it is argued that the concept of household strategy to explain a weakened gender division of labor is problematic because it is embedded with fundamental gender differences. Despite their increased participation in the labor force, married women continue to retain low-paying part-time employment, with no social insurance benefits. The suggestion that unemployed married men will adapt to new household strategies by taking on greater domestic responsibilities ignores the reactive potential of deep-seated male gendered ideology. Far from a reversal of household gender roles, traditional roles are reinforced as domestic strategies for coping with a worsening economic outlook cater to gender-specific needs. By discouraging married women from work, & targeting men, British unemployment benefits promote a gendered household structure. 14 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Loglinear analysis of 1981 survey data from 100 rural & 100 urban women in Seoul & Chungnam Province, South Korea, are drawn on to explore the effects of family planning practice on fertility decision-making power. Results indicate that women who practice family planning or have experienced abortion exercise greater influence on couple's fertility decision making than do those who do not practice family planning or have had no abortion experience. In addition, there is an interactive effect of abortion experience & contraceptive use on fertility decision making among urban women, a significant finding because, regardless of how birth control becomes available in a society, its use enhances women's decision power concerning fertility. 4 Tables, 9 References. ¶ Explored is the contradictory impact of governmentally sanctioned rutile mining in Sierra Leone, which, as in many other African countries, has resulted from intensified demand for public goods & services. Under the management of Sierra Rutile Limited, rutile mining has meant improved education, health care, sanitation, & employment for local Mende communities & families, but it has also meant the dredging & flooding of ancestral lands, forced relocation, & an unequal share of the burden falling on Mende women. Interviews with 27 married women at a maternity clinic in Mobimbi reveal that, notwithstanding the concrete advances made, the most problematic effect has been the loss of family economic self-sufficiency; village leadership is increasingly exploitative, male heads of household are increasingly irresponsible & dependent, & the physical landscape is increasingly ecologically endangered. 30 References. ¶ To test the idea that the supportive function of attachment relations may be most salient during early adolescent transitions, questionnaire measures of attachment to parents, emotional autonomy, perceived self-competence, depression, & anxiety were completed by 47 students from the midwestern US at 3 points during their transition into junior high school. Correlational results revealed that attachment to parents was significantly & positively correlated with measures of self-perceived competence, & significantly, but negatively, related to feelings of depression & anxiety. ¶ Multivariate loglinear analysis is used to explore patterns & trends in the association between wives' & husbands' educational attainment, 1950-1979, in Korea drawing on data from the 1975 & 1980 census. The most prominent feature in educational mating over time has been a rapid increase in college homogamy, 1960-1979, which has increased 3 times every decade since the 1950s. This increase reflects the increasing rigidity of the status order in Korea during the 1960s & 1970s, & is consistent with the conflict perspective, which argues that the dominant strata consolidates its class culture through homogamous marriages. From 1970-1979, hypergamy increased, sustaining the traditional marriage pattern while the country underwent industrialization. Although couples married during this period had greater educational hypogamy, this is attributed to demographic changes in age-heterogamous couples. 4 Tables, 3 Figures, 30 References. DeVault, Feeding the Family: The Social Organization of Caring as Gendered Work (U of Chicago Press, 1991) & Judith Stacey, Brave New Families: Stories of Domestic Upheaval in Late Twentieth Century America (Basic Books, 1990 [see listings in IRPS No. 68]). These books offer qualitative studies in feminist sociology, with a focus on the experience of women in contemporary US families. Hochschild & Machung argue that gender inequality in the family reflects a disjunction between three societal trends: rapid change among women entering paid employment, a slower rate of change in men enlarging their family role, & the slow response of social institutions in dealing with increases in two-earner families. Though recommended, the book is criticized for suggesting that working parents who use child care are uninterested in their children, & for drawing erroneous conclusions from data derived from time-use research. DeVault analyzes an aspect of women's work in families–food preparation & the social activities that go with it. She shows that the scheduling of meals & the fostering of sociability around them help organize people into families. Stacey examines changing interpretations of the family & modernization via analysis of two working-class kinship networks organized around two women in Santa Clara County, Calif. She argues that working-class & African American women should be viewed as the true "postmodern family pioneers," rather than as remnants of the modern family. 4 References. The Croatian zadruga (communal joint family) was a typical form of :ial organization in rural villages under Turkish & later Austrian rule. ate authority supported the zadrugas, especially in unsettled areas iere self-organization was necessary. The introduction of the market onomy in the nineteenth century stimulated the independence of smal- families leading to a weakening of the zadruga system. Various mid- ieteenth-century writers argued for retention of the zadruga system as afeguard against Western industrialization & as the foundation of the lectivist sentiment innate to Slavic cultures. However, the historical ect of adhering to the medieval system was to retard Croatian agricul- e & the process of social modernization. 11 References. Adapted from source document.

¶ An exploration of the sexual division of labor analyzes unequal opportunities for the sexes at several economic levels, ie, the family as a site for the construction, deconstruction, & redistribution of income, a consuming agent; a definite target for the labor offer; & an intermediary, organizational subject of the informal economy. The notion of the dual presence of women as core family member/employable worker is linked to findings of recent Italian studies. The organization of family resources & the structuring of the family inheritance has multiple effects on the sexes, limiting access to family resources & even questioning their legitimate entitlements. Because of this interdependence, the economic opportunities for those outside of the family unit, especially separated women, widows, & divorcees, are less favorable. 47 References. In this definition, the construction of families by persons is both constrained & enabled by the social environment. Primary groups are characterized by one of four types of interdependence (& multiple subtypes): extrinsic, intrinsic, formal (blood or law), or sexual. Primary groups can also be characterized either by generalized exchange & univocal reciprocity (typical of blood ties) or by restricted exchange & mutual reciprocity (typical of sexual ties). ¶ Like genetic codes, ideological codes reproduce their characteristic forms & order across various discursive settings. Here, the "Standard North American Family" (SNAF) is presented as an ideological code describing a married male & female sharing a household. despite a feminist method & critical perspective, the SNAF code shaped Ss' discourse about mothering & how researchers responded to these. The influence of SNAF was also apparent in William Julius Wilson's The Truly Disadvantaged: The Inner City, the Underclass, and Public Policy (Chicago: U of Chicago Press, 1987), both in the selection of Ss, the generation of government statistics, & the theory guiding the research. Ideological codes operate outside conscious intention, even in those who overtly resist the representations generated by them, & thus, may have significant political effects. 18 References. Results suggest that these groups do not differ dramatically in their kin & in-law adjustment, especially after the first few years of marriage. Kinship relations are best when the wife makes the effort to please her in-haws, regardless of caste, & relations can improve over time if the wife commits herself to such an effort. On the other hand, nonacceptance by in-laws, ill treatment of wife by in-laws, & wife's intense dislike of in-laws can preclude the possibility of cordial relations. Building on a substantive theory of the resocialization experience of becoming an adoptive parent, three theoretical properties of interactionist socialization are presented, which involve: unlearning & relearning some aspects of a core identity; the interpretation & active reconstruction of that identity which has reciprocal effects on all actors involved; the effects of both situational & trans-situational norms that give shape to the resocialization experience. Suggestions are made for other substantive areas of research that could be used for comparative analysis in order to further refine a formal theory of interactionist resocialization. References. ¶ Data from the Parenting Dimensions Inventory (PDI) & the Parenting Goals Questionnaire (PGQ) completed by 2 groups of middle-class mothers in Norfolk, Va (N = 38 immigrant Chinese & 38 Caucasian Americans with children ages 3-8 years), are drawn on to investigate cultural differences in childrearing practices. Comparison of the PDI scale scores revealed differences on all but the reasoning dimension: Caucasian-American mothers scored higher on sensitivity, consistency, nonrestrictiveness, nurturance, & rule setting, whereas immigrant Chinese mothers scored higher on physical punishment & yelling at the child. Examination of the parenting goals revealed no cultural main effect; however, a main effect was found for child's age. Both groups of mothers placed more emphasis on manners, school-related skills, & emotional adjustment during the early elementary school years than during the preschool years. Results are related to the need for immigrant Chinese to both maintain ties to their culture of origin & to accommodate to the socialization practices of the host culture. 4 Tables, 30 References. Secondary research is drawn on to explore black teenage pregnancy & problems of family organization in South Africa & the rest of Africa. Focus is on the increasing number of female-headed single parent families, out-of-wedlock children, abandoned babies, adolescents with sexually transmitted diseases, & teenage pregnancies. Teenage pregnancy is shown to be associated with disorganized family structure, an indifference to traditional cultural norms, low education, & contraceptive ignorance. Gender-specific sex education, upgrading socioeconomic environment & support systems, & the development of more effective social policies are advocated to prevent the further deterioration of the quality of life for pregnant teenagers. 25 References. ¶ Data are presented from an ongoing study of 220 children born 1961-1963 in Prague, Czechoslovakia, to women twice denied abortion for the same pregnancy & 220 pair-matched controls, whose mothers were also pair-matched for socioeconomic status & husband's/partner's presence in the home. All the children were born into intact homes, & were medically, psychologically, & socially assessed at ages 9, 14-16, & 21-23. Analysis reveals that differences between the 2 groups widened markedly over time, always to the disadvantage of the unwanted children. It is concluded that unwantedness in early pregnancy has an aggregate detrimental effect on children's psychosocial development. In adulthood, marital partners of the unwanted children were similar to their spouses, & the families were more problem-prone. 2 Tables, 4 Figures, 10 References. Adapted from the source document.

nterview data are used to compare impressions of self- & body images mothers who chose to give birth in the hospital vs at home (N = 31 & respectively). Focus is on motherhood symbols & physical changes ring gestation, suggesting that the microcosmic mirror or worldview is lected in differences in concepts of the unity of the body & self. The home group believed in the systematic, organic oneness of the mother baby, self & body, disrupted by medical intervention or modern obtric techniques. By contrast, the hospital birth group stressed the imrfection of the body, & the dependent relationship between medical :tification & the birth process. Issues defining the two ideologies, charterized as holistic vs technocratic are summarized. 1 Table, 44 References. Adapted from the source document. Gearty, Conor (King's Coll U London, WC2R 2LS England), The Politics of Abortion, UM Journal of Law and Society, 1992, 19, 4, winter, 441-463.

¶ In both the US & the Republic of Ireland, the problem of abortion has been turned from a political into a constitutional issue. Thus, the US Supreme Court (SC) has found a woman's right to choose an abortion in the penumbra to their eighteenth-century Bill of Rights, & the Irish have added a clause to their Constitution guaranteeing the right to life of the unborn The results of this constitutionalization have been unexpected. In the US, the SC has lurched to the Right as successive Republican presidents have sought to influence its composition so as to affect its decision on abortion. In Ireland, the antiabortion amendment has been interpreted in a way that permits abortions in certain circumstances. Unexpected consequences like these are bound to occur when an inherently political dilemma is transformed into a constitutional one. ¶ The nature of the contraceptive development & evaluation process is examined. After contributing significantly to women's liberation in the 1960s, contraceptives in the 1970s & 1980s have increasingly become subject to criticisms from feminist health groups who cite health risks & inattention to women's reproductive needs, experiences in using contraceptive methods, & the health care infrastructure in which the methods are provided. Case examples are offered on Depo Provera (a hormonal injection), RU 486 (the abortion pill), the contraceptive vaccine, & the hormonal implant Norplant. ¶ The consequences of socioeconomic status (SES) for the premarital pregnancy experiences of a nationally representative sample of sexually experienced adolescent women (N = 379 blacks & 625 nonblacks) are examined, utilizing data from Cycle III of the National Survey of Family Growth. Adolescent premarital pregnancy is conceived as a dynamic, age-dependent process. A structural equation modeling strategy is used to examine proximate determinants of the pregnancy process, making an attempt to evaluate the extent to which SES factors operate indirectly to affect the risk of pregnancy. Analysis reveals that among blacks, SES indirectly affects the risk for pregnancy through both contraceptive behavior & exposure to sexual intercourse. Among nonblacks, however, SES factors & the proximate determinants have independent effects. Directions for future research are suggested. 5 Tables, 22 References. Adapted from the source document. Consistent with previous studies, 27% of the respondents reported daily smoking during pregnancy, & whites reported higher rates of use than members of other racial groups. ¶ Questionnaire data are used to compare the self-esteem & perceived maternal care & control of 134 schoolgirls with 108 pregnant adolescents & teenage mothers ages 14-17 from working-class backgrounds across Jamaica. Results indicate that the 2 groups did not differ in perceived maternal care & control. However, the self-esteem of urban schoolgirls was significantly higher than that of their once-pregnant counterparts; this was also true of the total sample. Urban teenagers without father figures were nearly 2.7 times more likely to have been pregnant than were those living with adult male relatives. It is concluded that father-figure absence & low self-esteem may combine as risk factors for teenage pregnancy in urban Jamaica. 5 Tables, 25 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An examination of the role of modern reproductive technologies in mitigating the experience for expectant parents of pregnancy loss by miscarriage or stillborn death. Based on both poetry & narrative accounts of losses recalled during meetings of support groups, prenatal bonding typically beginning at the sensation of fetal movement now occurs earlier in gestation when the mother views sonogram images. Advanced biomedical techniques also heighten expectations of a guaranteed live delivery. However, faced with a pregnancy loss, parents often associate sonograms of the unborn with "angels," revealing an iconic or metaphoric construction of reality, in which dreams & hopes are informed by a technoscientific worldview. The conjunction of the increasingly fragmented realms of biomedical & Judeo-Christian discourse helps the bereaved define the inchoate, producing an edification by puzzlement. 3 Photographs, 107 References. ¶ It has been suggested that since RU 486–the abortion pill–does not require technically skilled health personnel, it has the potential to save lives in countries where thousands of women die annually from complications of failed abortions due to poor health services. Discussed here are medical & users' aspects of the abortion pill, focusing on its use in developing countries, particularly in areas where health care facilities are in short supply. The need to consider the social, cultural, & health care context in which the abortion pill will be used before it is sold on the world market is emphasized, arguing that the pill's safety & efficacy could be adversely affected by the way women perceive its effectiveness, beliefs about conception & pregnancy, & health status. It is concluded that in its current two-phase administration form, the abortion pill is not likely to be appropriate for use in developing countries with a shortage of health care facilities. 2 Tables, 66 References. ¶ It is argued that abortion is not a matter of convenience for women [illegible] intentionally became pregnant, but is a tragic attempt to escape fro[illegible] desperate situation. As such, women in this situation must be offe[illegible] real, compassionate, & better alternatives. The development of new reproductive technologies has increased family options. This new freedom to determine the form of the family impacts how people view their duties & responsibilities. The enterprise culture, based on consumer choices, sees having a child as the ultimate act of choice. In Western consumer culture, choice is always oriented toward enhancement, leading to prescriptive consumerism & fertility. However, a side-effect of prescriptive consumerism on the demand side is preemptive commercialization on the supply side, leading to the reproduction of procreative technologies. Special attention is given to the issue of gamete donation within the culture of consumer choice. 5 References. M. Sparks ¶ Outlined is the historical & policy background for research in this special journal issue on psychological perspectives on abortion (see related abstracts in this section of SA 41:3). President Reagan brought new life to public health concerns about abortion. Although then Surgeon General C. Everett Koop concluded that the scientific evidence was inadequate to say whether abortion caused psychological harm, debate continues. This debate is reviewed here, & the policy differences between pro-life & pro-choice advocates are examined. "Right-to-know" (informed consent) legislation is presented as a case study of how policy based on inadequate & flawed research evidence will experience implementation problems. 42 References. Drawing on fieldwork conducted since the 1960s on an island in the Cyclades (Greece), changes in ritual practices associated with death & mourning in a Greek Orthodox Christian community are described & discussed in light of a particular pattern of obligations by heirs to perform funerary & other rituals for those from whom property was inherited. These changes result from migration & return, & from improved communications between the island & mainland that have brought in tourists & tourist-related enterprises. A case study of violent & tragic death is examined in detail, & the construction, decoration, & care of the graves of the victims by various categories of relative are described. 4 Photographs, 12 References. Published data concerning suicide in 35 primitive societies that were classified as high, moderate, or low on independent measures of social integration & social regulation are used to test Emile Durkheim's theory of suicide. The estimated frequency of suicide did not differ between societies predicted to have high, moderate, & low suicide rates. Thus, Durkheim's theory was not confirmed. Possible reasons for these results are discussed. Adapted from the source document.

Madan, T. N. (Instit Economic Growth, Delhi 110007 India), Dying with Dignity, Social Science and Medicine, 1992, 35, 4, Aug, 425-432.
Folklore, ethnography, religious philosophy, literature, & medical texts are drawn on to compare Christian, Hindu, & Jainist perspectives on dying. Though each of these traditional cultures has held a positive & optimistic attitude toward death, in the West, death has been increasingly managed by medical intervention since the eighteenth century. Subjected to technological manipulations, this secularization of death has been accompanied by a loss of dignity & freedom of self-assessment, expression, & choice for the dying person. Alternative approaches to death practiced in other cultures are yielding to the Western paradigm. It is argued that these traditional approaches should be preserved to inform a more humane treatment of the dying person, prioritizing both cultural & individual responsibilities. The quality of the last moments of life, rather than its unnecessary prolongation, should be the objective. 26 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Survey data from 613 high school students in an upper-middle-class school district in western Pa are used to examine gender differences in the psychosocial correlates of suicidal ideation (SI). Results show that males (Ms) reported higher loneliness & substance abuse scores than did females (Fs), whereas Fs reported greater SI & depression. Also, Fs displayed a higher degree of fear of death & injury, whereas Ms evinced greater fear of social disapproval over having SI. Although depression, hopelessness, substance abuse, & few reasons for living emerged as predictors of SI, the equation accounted for more of the variance in SI for Fs than in Ms. Anger, impulsivity, fear of social disapproval, & less help-seeking behavior among Ms are variables suggested to explain the observed gender differences. 2 Tables, 28 References. ¶ An exploration of the conundrum facing an individual with a terminal disease who wishes to end his or her life in a manner that maintains a minimum of dignity. Focus is on conflict between the state's interest vs the individual's right to live or die. The interference by the state supplanting the church as the authority that interprets the boundaries between life & death, with the individual losing both voice & body to the impersonality of maintaining a life not worth living, is studied, as well as the implicit dangers when the freedom to decide when & who should die is measured against the present international economic situation. The need to listen to the language of the dying as well as to their need for a "closure" is discussed, & suggestions are offered for further research. 18 References. ¶ An empirical test of Emile Durkheim's hypothesis that suicide varies inversely with the extent of social integration in family, religious, political, & economic life. Data from Statistics Canada, 1971-1981, are drawn on to explore the suicide rate among youth ages 15-29 as a function of: family integration (as measured by divorce), religious integration (as measured by the % of the population reporting no religious affiliation), & economic anomie (unemployment). Results confirm the hypothesis that religious detachment among the young is associated with increased proneness to commit suicide. The effect of family dissolution is positive & significant in 1981, but not in 1971, partially confirming the family integration explanation of suicide. Results pertaining to unemployment are not consistent with the US-based literature, which describes a significant & positive impact on the odds of self-destruction. 3 Tables, 57 References. It is shown that military rhetoric of health for all, & the promise of economic & political salvation do not exist in reality, as is demonstrated in declining nutrition level, scarce & unequal access to medical treatment, & underequipped hospitals. ¶ Data from the British government's 1986 Informal Carers Survey (N = 18,328 adults in private households) are used to examine class inequalities in informal caring for elderly, handicapped, & disabled people in GB Results show that, in working-class families, women & men are more likely than their middle-class counterparts to provide care for an impaired or elderly person in the same household. Coresident care is more time-intensive than extraresident care, & therefore is more likely to constrain the life & resources of the caregiver, especially those of working age who have competing demands on their time. It is concluded that class inequalities in informal care reflect the socially structured nature of ill health in British society, since the greatest ill health & disability are suffered by those in the lower classes. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, 2 Appendixes, 47 References. ¶ It is shown that, from 1850-1930, the poor quality of milk in England partly resulted from the nature of the marketing system, as well as from adulteration & the use of chemical preservatives. Local authority regulation & central government legislation were very slow in controlling the cleanliness of production & sale. Milk was heavily contaminated with bacteria & was responsible for spreading a variety of diseases, eg, scarlet fever & tuberculosis. Improvements such as pasteurization & bottling were slow to spread & are unlikely to have had much impact before the 1920s. It is concluded that ill health caused by dirty milk was more serious, & its amelioration much later, than previously documented. 9 Tables. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The Medicaid Values Framework (MVF), developed to introduce an explicit values element for reforming the expense maintenance-driven Medicaid system, is presented. The societal ideals legislated in Title XIX of the Social Security Amendments of 1965 are embodied in the MVF's three-tiered structure–equality, quality, & access–according to which access to Medicaid should prioritize liberalization of eligibility, confidentiality, recipient choice, broadening scope of care, & quality assurance. After discussing each tier in detail, the access & equality tiers are used to assess the Supplemental Security Income & Aid to Families with Dependent Children programs. It is noted that both programs unfairly apply eligibility standards, & that funding is different for each. However, applicants rejected for those programs would not be barred from receiving Medicaid. The ethical unacceptability of such a lack of equality in program eligibility standards targeted at excluding the "undeserving" poor is noted. 2 Tables, 3 Figures, 1 Appendix, 49 References. ¶ Data obtained in the course of fieldwork since 1987 are analyzed in attempt to account for the remarkable rise of female (F) healers in the Middle Atlas mountains of Morocco. Emphasis is on 2 groups of F healers: herbalists in the marketplace & midwives in the rural region of the Berber tribe Ait Abdi. The role of indigenous women, & men, in healing among the seminomadic Berber tribes of the past was minor, a situation that barely changed over the years. Arab men, who settled as Koran savants or visited the local markets & the local holy tribes (Chorfa) monopolized the prestigious healing activities, largely because they had better accepted forms of legal & traditional legitmacy at their disposal. Among the more professional traditional healers today, these men are being replaced by Arab & Chorfa women. This loss of male (M) prestige in traditional healing is explained by the decreasing significance of a traditional means of legitimation & prestige of which healing is a part: God's transmissible blessing–baraka. Reasons why this collapse of traditional prestige has afflicted dominant status groups (such as M Chorfa) more than subdominant groups such as Arab & Chorfa women are explicated. Reply, 291-296.
¶ A response to Allan Mitchell's "An Inexact Science: The Statistics of Tuberculosis in Late Nineteenth-Century France" (Social History of Medicine, 1990, 3, 3, 387-403), claiming that tuberculosis (TB) statistics alone cannot disprove Thomas McKeown's thesis (see The Modern Rise of Population, London, 1976) that improved European diets, rather than improved public hygiene, contributed to lowered mortality rates. Besides questionable impressionistic data sources, Mitchell's argument about number of victims is not based on statistics. Comparative European economic histories with standard of living indices, (eg, length of work week, wage levels, job security) are better potential gauges of his argument that lower standards of living in France resulted in higher TB death rates. In Tuberculosis Statistics and the McKeown Thesis: A Rebuttal to David Barnes, Mitchell (U of California, San Diego, La Jolla) defends the accuracy of his sources, while questioning data that Barnes quotes. He does not convincingly support his qualified McKeownite position that improvements of diet, housing, & labor conditions alone led to declined TB mortality rates. 3 Tables, 4 Figures. J. ¶ It has been suggested by some writers that people's health can influence their social mobility & consequently their position in the social hierarchy, & that this effect is an important element in the process that produces social class differences in health. This idea is examined by drawing together evidence from a range of published research. Findings suggest that direct selection according to health has little effect on class gradients. The logically distinct idea of indirect selection can be seen most usefully as referring to the accumulation of advantage or disadvantage during life. 56 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The relationship between 903 male (M) homosexuals in Germany & their physicians (MDs) is examined using questionnaire data from patients. Analysis shows that about 40% chose a homosexual M as an MD. Being able to talk freely about homosexuality is a key factor in a good MD-patient relationship. AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) is an important topic of conversation: most MDs choose to let the patients themselves bring it up, & do not try to force information on their clients. Special attention is given to how fears about human immunodeficiency virus infection have changed sexual behavior since the AIDS epidemic began. Although some homosexual Ms seem to be better served by homosexual M MDs, it cannot be said that this is true for all. 7 Tables, 25 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Questionnaire data are used to examine knowledge of & attitudes toward AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) among adults (N = 2,118) in the former West Germany. Analysis shows that, in some aspects, AIDS is viewed as a consequence of risk-taking; however, AIDS is also perceived as a danger, with the threat of infection dependent on the behavior of people other than oneself. Generally, poorly educated, rural, & traditionally religious respondents (Rs) tend to view AIDS as a danger, while well-educated, urban, & more open-minded Rs tend to view AIDS as a risk. Ironically, the group that perceives AIDS as an external threat is characterized by a more conservative lifestyle, which reduces its level of risk-taking behaviors. 13 Tables, 11 Figures, 80 References. The symbolic aspect of health & well-being links belief in the existence of supernatural beings with social self-control & psychological stability. Rather than a physical & nondirected deterioration of vital functions, both psychic & somatic illnesses reflect a hidden, undeciphered message that involves the community & the afflicted person. Traditional treatment for attacks from "genies" (Ĝnûn) depends on degree of possession, & includes ceremonial exorcisms. The treatments of modern psychiatry are considered less effective given the cultural context. 1 Table, 14 References. J. Sadler ¶ Previous research has suggested that attitudes toward people with AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) & related policy issues are primarily motivated by symbolic attitudes concerning homosexuality & gay rights. Here, analysis of data from the 1988 General Social Survey shows that attitudes toward AIDS policies are differentiated by various types of possible government actions, & that only some of these are significantly related to homophobic attitudes. While some AIDS policies are typically related to general attitudes toward government assistance to disadvantaged people, & to public health spending, the effects of these instrumental values are sometimes independent of the effects of symbolic attitudes toward homosexuality & gay rights. 1 Table, 30 References. ¶ A random sample of medical records of students (N = 797) served by a full-service health clinic at San Diego State U, Calif, were reviewed to investigate the efficacy of a prompt checklist for increasing health risk behavior (HRB) screening, counseling, & referral in a primary care setting. The analysis considers 11 HRBs significant in a young adult population & 3 provider behaviors (discussion of the risk behavior, behavior change advice, & referral for more in-depth counseling). The results support the hypotheses that: a prompting "cue" would increase provision of health promotion services, the nature of the clinical visit would to some extent define the provider's behavior, & individual variability would appear in response to the intervention. Findings plotted separately for gynecologic birth control visits & other regular visits & for 2 groups of health care providers reveal that the intervention has a modest but reliable effect on both groups' discussion frequency, during both types of visit. Prescribing behavior was affected to a clinically significant degree only in the regular visits of both groups. A major limitation to the study is the absence of direct observations of the providers' actual behavior during the visits. Further studies that examine more powerful & tailored interventions, which may be necessary to increase provision of these services in a broad spectrum of primary care providers, are recommended. 2 Tables, 3 Figures, 32 References. ¶ The epidemiology of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection of females (Fs) in the Caribbean & Latin America was examined through analysis of case reports compiled by the Pan American Health Organization (PAHO) & HIV infection in the Americas data collected by PAHO & the US Census Bureau. The rate of increase in incidence of acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) between 1986 & 1989 ranged from 244% in the non-Latin Caribbean to 4,600% in Central America. The overall rate of increase resembled that of men in the Americas region. AIDS cases attributable to heterosexual transmission rose to 30% by 1990. Cases of pediatric AIDS also rose sharply. Among Fs afflicted with AIDS, 27.5% were under age 25; data on HIV infection are inadequate, but reports of seroprevalences in excess of 10% among high-risk women are relatively rare. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 18 References. Negative physical images, in which old age was considered a pathology, prevailed up until the mid-nineteenth century when geriatric medicine was developed, primarily in Germany & France; consequently, the description of aging & old age diseases was systematized, but with some influence of ancient ideas about aging. A review of Danish popular health books 1850-1920 reveals that three concepts of old age coexisted: ad[illegible] ed from ancient medical philosophy, reflecting the achievements of [illegible] temporary medical science, & a new idea of prolonged youth. The effect of sexually transmitted diseases & those nonsexually transmitted (eg, tuberculosis, malaria, sleeping sickness, anemias, schistosomiasis, filiariasis) is discussed. Disease may also affect fertility through the time spent in unions & contraceptive use. In general, poor nutritional status, the norm in many developing countries, increases the risk of maternal mortality & low birth weight. In developed countries, moderate weight loss of 10%-15% in women can lead to amenorrhoea; the implications of this finding for women in developing countries require further study. ¶ Data on 3,318 patient visits are used to test the hypothesis that physi cians (MDs) use low-level involvement strategies for follow-up care, self care or community referral) when the MD judges the patient to be poorl motivated, regardless of the type of problem being addressed. The hy pothesis that MDs select low MD-involvement strategies for dealing wit health promotion-disease prevention problems, regardless of the level o patient motivation, is also tested. The findings demonstrate that the leve of MD involvement in follow-up care varied with the type of problem en countered & with the assessed level of patient motivation. MDs assesse only 5% of all patients with traditional biomedical problems as havin low levels of motivation vs 24% of patients with health promotion-diseas prevention problems. It is suggested that factors influencing MD behav ior in selecting self-care strategies for poorly motivated patients includ prior unrewarding experiences in dealing with poorly motivated patient the lack of skills or confidence to motivate & assist patients to chang their behavior, level of patient motivation, time constraints, & lack of re imbursement for health promotion-disease prevention services. ¶ Survey data from a convenience sample of 158 first-year students o an urban college campus are drawn on to determine their sexual prac tices & their knowledge & attitudes about acquired immune deficienc syndrome (AIDS). Among the 77 sexually active students, many en gaged in activities that could facilitate transmission of human immu nodeficiency virus: 58% did not always use condoms with a new partne 31% had had 2+ partners in the last year; 8% engaged in anonymous se & 14% of women had anal intercourse. Although most said they woul use condoms more or reduce the number of their sexual partners if the believed these changes would reduce the risk of AIDS, few had adopte these practices. Safer sexual practices were associated with heightene personal concerns about AIDS, but not with knowledge, which was at high level. The utility of the concept of adaptation in contemporary medical anthropology is evaluated in the context of the human experience in Antarctica, characterized by prolonged isolation, confinement, & exposure to extreme environmental conditions. Archival, ethnographic, & quantitative data on scientists & technicians who have stayed the winter at either of 2 US research stations indicate that they often exhibit an array of psychophysiological symptoms in response to these stressors. However, this experience also appears to provide long-term health benefits. It is concluded that the psychological symptoms are themselves part of the process of coping, & do not necessarily represent an inability to adapt to the extreme environment. Coping is viewed as a process of negotiation leading to a compromise between individual & group needs. The cultural systems of Antarctic research stations are both a product of this negotiation & a set of normative & pragmatic rules regulating this process that fosters the acquisition of new strategies or resources for coping with subsequent stressful experiences. 4 Tables, 76 References. Data from a variety of secondary sources reveal that transformations within civil society in ideological alignment & lifestyle are central to changing patterns in illness. Countermeasures to safeguard against injury or to control major hygienic problems are gradually incorporated into the culture. Modern hygienic intervention at early life stages vastly improves survival rate, reducing the full pathological effects of disease. However, major environmental damage or threat of nuclear war are potential challenges to the net gains in health from economic development. 6 Tables, 2 Figures. Adapted from the source document.

¶ To issue an advanced directive is to bind oneself ahead of time to som

course of action or treatment. Allen Buchanan & D. Brock have related Derek Parfit's influential theory of personal identity to the use of advance directives in certain medical settings; eg, when a person issues instructions concerning care, should he/she suffer an irreversible coma or advanced Alzheimer's disease (Buchanan; Allen, "Advance Directives and the Personal Identity Problem," Philosophy & Public Affairs, 1988, 17; Buchanan, Allen, & Brock, D., Deciding for Others: The Ethics of Surrogate Decision Making (New York: Cambridge U Press, 1989). They argue that, because even limited continuity between earlier & later psychological states warrants our speaking of the same person persisting through time, Parfit's theory is compatible with the moral authority usually accorded to advance directives. Buchanan & Brock also extend their support for the use of advance directives to psychiatry. Here, however, their proposals require substantial qualification. In an attempt to make good this challenge, it is established that neither intuitive nor formal standards can be appealed to in eliminating the borderline & problem cases of competence in this area, & that adopting an identity-preserving threshold so that the same person both issues & later is subject to the "Ulysses contract" or "psychiatric will," as these agreements are termed in psychiatry, shifts but does not solve concerns about a policy of honoring the advance directives of mental patients. Because of features of our moral response to advance directives in everyday settings, if the patient's contract primarily concerns himself/herself, & the patient seems to experience a change of mind, only unwarranted prejudice could explain not treating the Ulysses contractor exactly as a normal person, allowing the patient's new decision to cancel the earlier resolve. ¶ In 1980, the World Health Organization (WHO) approved a European Region Health for All by the Year 2000 strategy, which was an important breakthrough for WHO–the first time regional member states endorsed a common health policy & agreed to be monitored on their progress toward attainment of health goals. Here, WHO statistics compiled in 1991 are used to evaluate the progress of member states to date within the context of the six fundamental principles underlying the Health for All concept: equity, health promotion, community involvement, multisectoral participation, primary (local) health care, &, international cooperation. It is argued that the commitment of member states to the Health for All strategy has been patchy, with only moderate success toward meeting the 38 regional targets. Poor progress is attributed to changing national & international political & economic circumstances, limited resources, & perhaps most importantly, to a lack of political will. 1 Table, 30 References. ¶ Official statistics, supplemented by secondary source data, are used to evaluate the true impacts of smokers on nonsmokers in Canada. Supplementary costs related to smoking are estimated at $669 million for 1986. However, since future health cost reductions reach $462 million, the net external costs generated do not exceed $207 million. These costs give rise to transfers, but these are more than compensated for by other transfers, eg, taxes paid by smokers & reductions in pension benefits, leading to a net flow overall of $4.3 billion in favor of nonsmokers. The direction of this conclusion remains unchanged even after considering a wide range of medical hypotheses; policy implications are discussed. 5 Tables, 1 Graph, 70 References. ¶ A cost-benefit analysis of the social, economic, & ethical implications of the application of high cost technology (HCT) for health care. It is shown that, while the opportunities for prevention, diagnosis, & therapy are increased for the patient, the main beneficiaries of the development of HCT are clinicians, hospital management, & governmental regulation agencies. In Europe, there has been increased privatization of health care & a reduced role for governmental regulation of HCTs. Policy decisions must account for the sometimes inefficient & unequitable performance of HCT & promote more cost-effective technologies designed to serve a wider public. 2 Figures, 38 References. ¶ Evidence derived from the structure of the discourse & behavior of three Alzheimer's disease sufferers demonstrates that the self–ie, the self of personal identity–persists until the last stage of the disease. The multiple personae of the self that are projected into the public arena, & that require the cooperation of others to come into being, can be lost, but only indirectly, as a result of the disease. The primary cause of the loss of self is how others view & treat the Alzheimer's sufferer. Recommendations are made regarding interactions between sufferers & caregivers. 18 References. ¶ The construction of intravenous drug users (IVDUs) as a group at risk for AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) is critiqued by contrasting the portrayal of an IVDU subculture with studies that report on the diversity of behavior of IVDUs. The tendency of epidemiologically oriented AIDS researchers to equate IVDUs with minority population & to construct a category of "Hispanic" as a population at risk for AIDS is shown to be problematic. The cultural construction of AIDS is analyzed as part of the hegemonic processes of the US that exclude those seen as culturally distant from the body politic. 60 References. Though marital status has been related to morbidity & mortality, the ationship between marital status & obesity is not well established. le theory alternatively suggests: (1) through a marital causation mod- that married people are more likely to be obese, & (2) through a mari- selection model, that married people are less likely to be obese be- ise of stigmatization. The former model is examined here using data m a cross-sectional national telephone survey of 3,025 US adults ages 64. Sequential regression analyses reveals that married men are sig- icantly fatter & more likely to be obese than are their never married previously married counterparts, even when controlling for demo- phic, social, & physical variables. By contrast, marital status is not nificantly associated with fatness or obesity among women when other iables are controlled. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 82 References. Adapted m the source document. 'ata on 18,490 infants who made a first visit to a county child health ic (CHC) in Md 1975-1977 are used to determine if services received cted subsequent use of the clinics. The results show that 25% of the ly children returned to the CHCs for at least 1 visit at age 2-3, but 6 never returned. Further, 20% did not receive an immunization dur- the first year of life. Given the low return rates, the findings indicate lequate care for these children if the CHCs are the only source of pre- tive care. These findings are consistent with previous studies indicat- less than optimal preventive health care among poor children. Expla- ons for low use of care among low-income children may include infre- ntly scheduled clinics or few sites, the failure to administer an immu- tion, & the contraindication of immunization for infants who need ialty care or who present for well-baby visits with acute illness. How- , it is contended that the high costs of immunization & the failure iany private insurers to cover these costs make public clinics a poten- source of immunizations for middle- as well as low-income families. bles, 6 References. An argument is constructed about the quilt as a site of cul- memory, where personal memories are shared, often anonymously, effort to share the pain of loss. ¶ Social, economic, & cultural trends linked with patterns of disease, 1950-1988, are reviewed from a global perspective, based on statistical measures of mortality, life expectancy, nutrition, domestic per capita product, women's participation in the workforce, & level of education. Decreases in traditional health hazards among the developed countries stemmed from social advances triggered by the nineteenth-century revolution in public health. Chronic disease is the target of these countries' second public health revolution. However, Third World & Eastern European countries are still socially & physically disadvantaged, which contributes to continuing problems with disease control. Although quantitative & experimental research on correlations between social trends & disease patterns has pointed to increased risk in low socioeconomic status countries, problems in data interpretation result in a preference here for observational & "soft" methods. 11 Tables, 62 References. ¶ Data obtained in 1991 via questionnaire & interview from 649 patients in 8 private hospitals & 3 British National Health Service (NHS) hospitals are used to examine the extent to which women choose private hospitals & to identify whether the perceived benefits are specific to women & different from the benefits men perceive. Findings indicate that advantages of "going private" center around choice of admission dates, perceived better care, & privacy, conditions not currently met by the NHS. For men, the most common reason for private care was scheduling for minimum disruption to their employment. For women, choice of admission date & perceived better care were important, to minimize disruption at home, more than at work. It is suggested the results reflect the gender role ideology of man as provider & woman as carer. Whether in paid employment or not, women have primary responsibility for child care & domestic work. 28 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Recent reforms in GB's National Health Service introducing general management, ushering in market principles, & increasing emphasis on health promotion & disease prevention, particularly in the primary care sector, are discussed. Drawing on a critique of the recent (re)emergence of health promotion & disease prevention on the political agenda, implications of such reforms for the various actors & agencies within the primary care sector are examined, including: the new managerial accountability of general practitioners (GPs) to the new Family Health Services Authority (FHSA); the GP contract's emphasis on the development of the practice nurse, with a shift to clinic-based remuneration & flexibility in reimbursement of other types of ancillary staff; & greater competition. The new contract generates doubts about the quality of the services provided; much will depend on the role of the audit committees & the level of support & direction given by the FHSA. With respect to professional autonomy, it is too early to judge whether the reforms will put the professional sovereignty of GPs at risk. However, the emphasis on consumer sovereignty, managerialism, & the development of primary health teams may encourage processes of deprofessionalization & proletarianization. 72 References. Although such a conceptualization would be an im ovement on the current definition, it is argued that a definition of men l retardation based on social competence outcomes (ie, need for support playing critical social roles) would be preferable to a definition that still tied too closely to psychometric criteria. 1 Figure, 59 References. lapted from the source document. Although group discussion covered a range of topics, questions about the meaning of diagnosis, the extent of personal responsibility for the illness, the nature of members' reliance on medical experts, & the efficacy of psychotropic medications were dominant themes. Group discussion generated a rhetoric that provided plausible explanations for members' shared difficulty while protecting their identities. ¶ It is proposed that improved linkages between academic institutions & the public, in concert with federal, local, state, & university reform, can provide a collective solution to the personnel crisis in public mental health crisis. The dimensions of the crisis are discussed, showing that staff in the major mental health disciplines are not particularly interested in working with seriously mentally ill persons, because they do not perceive the work as prestigious. Critical issues affecting the training of mental health professionals are explored, & strategies to facilitate the development of strong public/academic linkages are offered. The Ohio Dept of Mental Health's development of several public/academic initiatives in response to the personnel crisis is discussed as a model that other areas might adopt. 41 References. ¶ Mail survey data from a sample of 1,037 workers claiming job-related injuries 1983/84 in Wash are used to investigate the direct & indirect effects of pain & work limitation associated with such injuries on self-efficacy, self-esteem & depression. Path analytic procedures reveal that self-efficacy & self-esteem are negatively associated with depression, while work limitation & pain are positively associated with depression. Work limitation has additional indirect effects on depression through its effect on self-efficacy & self-esteem, while pain has additional indirect effects via its effect on self-efficacy & work limitation. Results support the hypothesis that self-concept significantly mediates the relationship between physical injury & depression. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 69 References. ¶ Anonymous questionnaire data are drawn on to compare eating attitudes, body concept, & self-esteem among a random sample of 29 male (M) & 30 female (F) professional fashion models & controls (N = 30 M & 30 F undergraduates) in New York City; samples were predominantly Caucasian & from upper- & middle- class backgrounds. Fs in both groups displayed significantly more eating-disordered behavior & lower levels of body satisfaction & self-esteem than did Ms. Whereas the self-esteem of F models was higher than that of F controls, the self-esteem of M models & controls did not differ; F undergraduates displayed the lowest self-esteem among the groups. Despite the fact that the majority of F models were underweight & the majority of F undergraduates within recommended weight ranges, both groups displayed similar levels of eating-disordered behavior. Results suggest that the slender figures of professional fashion models are best viewed as lying at one extreme of the normal distribution of body types rather than as the product of purposeful dieting behavior to be attained by the average F. 6 Tables, 1 Figure, 70 References. ¶ The sociodemographic & behavioral characteristics of intraven drug users (IVDUs) at risk for human immunodeficiency viru changes in needle-sharing behavior in response to the acquired imm deficiency syndrome (AIDS) epidemic are examined, based on inter & urinalysis data on arrestees (N = 3,516) in 20 cities from the Drug Forecasting program. The findings indicate that: rates on intrave drug use are higher among females; older IVDUs have higher rate lifetime intravenous drug use, lifetime needle sharing, & current ne sharing; & less-educated arrestees are more likely to have injected in past 6 months & to have never shared needles. IVDUs are very likel test positive for recent use of 2+ drugs, generally heroin & cocain are also likely to have multiple sex partners; further, the more part an IVDU had in the previous year, the higher the probability that he shares needles. Arrestees who have been in drug treatment are more l ly than others to inject drugs, & IVDUs who have been in treatmen ore likely to share needles. It is concluded that the data provide a com- elling rationale for immediate implementation of an AIDS information counseling system throughout the nation's jails. ¶ The history of the Al-Anon & Adult Children of Alcoholics (ACOA) traditions & the emergence of the codependence literature suggest im- portant shifts in the way many American women have understood prob- lems associated with caregiving, & in how they have drawn on & inter- preted the twelve-step philosophy of Alcoholics Anonymous. Guided by feminist & psychodynamic perspectives, a critique is offered of the con- temporary codependence literature that defines caregiving roles as pathological, & then considers the implications of the addiction model of dependency. Analysis of the organizational literature shows how wom- en's articulation of & responses to the problem of codependence have changed over time, from Al-Anon in the 1950s-1970s, & through the ACOA movement of the 1980s. It is concluded that the historical transi- tion from Al-Anon to ACOA represents a progressive appropriation of feminist ideals & broadening critique of the family that extends beyond the alcoholic family. Further, this broadening critique remains tied to a set of conservative premises that limit its capacity to explain relational conflict or family dysfunction. 1 Appendix, 57 References. Few differences were found in models predicting violent as opposed to property crime, al- though minority status was a more important predictor of violent crime, & poverty was a more important predictor of property crime. Cocaine use was the most important covariate of being booked for a crime in large metropolitan areas, which were oversampled in the 1991 NHSDA. 7 Ta- bles, 2 Figures, 39 References. ¶ To estimate the frequency & amount of smuggled liquor purchased in Norway in 1990, an interviewing technique known as randomized re- sponse (RR) was used. Valuable for eliciting a voluntary, if not totally precise, response to sensitive questions, RR is an alternative to the use of direct response (DR). While the advantage of DR is greater accuracy, it also yields highly biased answers. In the experiment, 75% of the re- spondents were asked sensitive questions, ie, about buying smuggled li- quor, & the other 25% were asked direct questions. Although young peo- ple responded similarly to both techniques, the DR group revealed less about liquor purchase habits than did the RR group. 5 Tables, 9 Refer- ences. Analysis indicates that children's perceptions of friends'/family's substance use, & actual use by classmates, were better predictors of substance abuse than friends' actual use. Peer behaviors & attitudes appear to be more influential for children's socially censured behaviors (eg, using alcohol without parental permission) than for more socially approved behaviors (eg, using alcohol with parental permission). ¶ The characteristics of anorexia nervosa as described in the DSM-III-R are reviewed in relation to normative gender roles & adolescent development. Using a feminist approach, two contradictory explanations for the irrational pursuit of thinness are critiqued: the first posits that the anorexic attempts to conform to a socially defined feminine ideal; the second suggests that anorexia is an attempt to avoid the appearance & consequences of mature womanhood. It is contended that both explanations are valid, exemplifying Simone de Beauvoir's claim that ambiguity is characteristic of female experience (The Second Sex, Parshley, H. M. (Tr), New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1972). It is concluded that the DSM III-R fails to acknowledge anorexia nervosa as a disorder of gender identity, & that appropriate therapy should include efforts to alter the socialization factors implied in the disorder. 28 References. Of the respondents (Rs), 54.5% stated that they had committed illegal actions to obtain money for gambling. Comparison of this subgroup to those who did not admit to criminal offenses show distinct differences: Rs who admitted illegal action were more excessive in their gambling behavior, experienced a higher degree of subjective satisfaction from it, & showed more psychosocial problems because of gambling. ¶ Telephone survey data from a random sample of 1,011 Iowa residents is drawn on to investigate the relationship between age & gambling. Results indicate that chronological age is negatively related to gambling behavior; however, people of different ages participate in different types of gambling. The general decline in gambling across age categories is conceptualized as a result of an age decline in experimentation with gambling for self-indentity & self-presentation, as well as a historical increase in the social acceptance of gambling. The differential rates of participation in different types of gambling could result from differential needs & resources related to different stages of development & thus age categories. 4 Tables, 2 Figures, 65 References. ¶ The most recent war on drugs launched by the US government in 198[illegible] has involved establishing various policies & making investments to implement them. A tough-guy stand to drug abuse & control has been adopted that emphasizes punishment, restriction, & social warfare, as opposed to a public health oriented position. It is maintained here that current policy reflects a "quick fix" solution to a complex problem, which may partially explain its failure. Current debates & controversies surrounding drug abuse in the US are summarized regarding the extent of the drug problem, the need for drug control, prevention efforts, legalization controversy, workplace strategies, treatment dilemmas, & maternal drug abuse. It is argued that a radically different approach is needed that is grounded in public health methods & an appreciation of the larger social context in which drug abuse occurs. 39 References. ¶ Statistical data are presented to demonstrate that the 1980s witnessed an increase in both alcohol availability & consumption in Iceland. This trend is attributed to liberalization of the restrictive alcohol policy, which legalized beer sales, & allowed for the opening of new monopoly retail outlets & an increase in the number of public drinking places. In the mid-1980s, public discourse in New Zealand on alcohol was intensified by: a government report on the laws governing the manufacturing, distribution, supply, & sale of liquor; the introduction of low-alcohol beer & wine coolers; & public attention to the alcohol-related areas of health & violence. Analysis of this discourse identifies the major interest groups in the liquor arena, their theoretical stances, & the role of research. The theory that a minority of alcohol users are responsible for alcohol abuse is espoused in general by the liquor industry, while health promotion groups believe that the problem is in the product, because liquor is damaging to all users to various degrees. Research results & folk wisdom about wine vs other liquors have been interwoven in the discourse by both theoretical sides in arguments over taxation. After discussing how psychoactive chemical use, abuse, & dependence can impede college student development, described are the rewards of providing chemical abuse consultation to the young person struggling with a normal developmental hurdle of late adolescence or with pathology brought to or occurring at that time. Such consultation can prevent the development of short- or long-term chemical abuse, & also break up a destructive development crisis. Knowledge of the individual & group psychodynamics of chemical abuse, & the developmental issues of late adolescence & early adulthood, is essential to providing such consultation. Preparedness for the problems & crises of student substance abuse requires a set of attitudes, awareness, compassion, structure, support, & service systems that address substance use & abuse as an expected but uninformed & potentially destructive effort of a student to address a developmental challenge. 1 Table, 53 References. ¶ An experimental exploration of the relationship between alcohol consumption & high-risk behavior for human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection. Ss (N = 313 in-treatment intravenous drug users (IVDUs) in programs in Seattle, Wash) were randomly assigned to 1 of 3 interventions: (1) structured interview regarding risk behavior; (2) interview plus 1 group acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) education session; or (3) interview, AIDS education, & optional HIV testing. Alcohol users (N = 148) had more needle sharing & sexual partners than did nondrinkers. Follow-up interviews revealed no significant behavioral changes as a function of intervention condition or alcohol use. It is concluded that better interventions, particularly more vigorous treatment of alcohol use, are needed to reduce risk behaviors among IVDUs. 2 Tables, 3 Figures, 37 References. ¶ Responding via open-ended scales to an audiotaped vignette of a teenage male problem drinker, Native-American, Hispanic, & Anglo sixth grade students (total N = 69) from 3 schools near Tucson, Ariz, expressed similar beliefs & attitudes in many respects. However, Native Americans viewed the problem as less serious, subscribed more to a disease theory of alcoholism, attributed less causal responsibility to the individual, & adopted a less aggressive approach toward treatment than did Hispanic, & especially Anglo, children. The majority of these differences were accounted for by the less-conventional value orientations of the Native-American children; implications for alcohol abuse prevention programs targeted at this population are discussed. 2 Tables, 22 References. ¶ An examination of correlations of community mobilization around drug vs crime problems, & with attention on the link between activism & local drug problems & the impact of local social & organizational factors on the extent to which residents mobilized to fight drugs, based on interview data for positionally defined informants in 33 communities in 6 large US cities. In general, areas studied were 47% African American, 14% Hispanic, & 32% white. Unemployment was reported to be increasing in 10 areas, & problems with gangs were thought to be increasing in 13 areas. The average neighborhood score for the level of property crime was midway between average & moderately high, whereas violent crime was just above average. Drug problems were found to be higher in poor, minority neighborhoods where rates of violent & property crime are high. All target areas had some antidrug activity, & there was a clear relationship between forms of confrontational activism & neighborhood drug problems. Multivariate analyses indicate that the organizational capacity of the community stimulates confrontational activism. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 13 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ San Diego County, Calif, is used as a focus for investigating the integration between drug use & crime indicators to determine impact & effectiveness of drug control strategies. Specifically, an attempt is made to identify sources of drug abuse information in the justice & the health system, assess the use & value of multiple drug use indicators for policy making, & develop a statistical model to examine the relationship of justice & health indicators of drug use. The mixed & inconsistent results suggest that the association between criminal justice indicators & health system indicators of drug use is negligible for the time period & geographic area studied. A model that suggests population as the most significant predictor has little practical value. Furthermore, the analysis showed that integrating justice indicators was not useful for predicting drug use in the larger community, as measured by the health system data. 4 Tables, 3 Figures. Traver, Harold (U Hong Kong, Hong Kong), Opium to Heroin: Restrictive Opium Legislation and the Rise of Heroin Consumption in Hong Kong, Journal of Policy History, 1992, 4, 3, 307-324.

¶ As in many other parts of the Far East, the immediate postwar years in Hong Kong saw a dramatic & rapid shift away from opium to other addictive drugs, in particular, heroin. The fact that this shift coincided with the introduction of antiopium legislation has encouraged observers to conclude that the total prohibition of opium forced opium users to switch to heroin. Here, examined are the consequences of the Hong Kong government's monopoly on the sale & distribution of opium. A government monopoly meant that the authorities had an immediate economic stake in suppressing competing drugs, as well as the ability to compete in the drug market & shape consumer preferences. The subsequent decline in opium smoking was not so much an example of a successful drug suppression campaign as it was the withdrawal of government involvement in the drug economy, thereby enabling heroin, as the more cost effective & profitable drug, to freely & successfully compete for consumer attention. A fuller understanding of Hong Kong's opium monopoly & the government's role in the sale of opium may contribute to the current debate over whether some form of legalization might provide a solution to the problem of drugs in contemporary society. It is concluded that governments may be more successful in promoting the use of specific forms of drugs than they are in suppressing their use. Walton, Joyce A., Attitudes among College Students as They Apply to Labeling the Alcoholic/Problem Drinker, UM Free Inquiry in Creative Sociology, 1992, 20, 2, Nov, 217-222.

¶ Labeling theory is drawn on to examine the attitudes of college students toward the labels of "alcoholic" & "problem drinking." Utilizing semantic differential scales, 317 college students at a large commuter university responded to 1 of 3 randomly assigned scenarios, in which: (1) a fictitious individual was referred to as having a drinking problem; (2) that individual was labeled an alcoholic; & (3) no qualifying adjective was used. Findings suggest that persons who jeopardize their health by drinking excessively are perceived as socially deviant, & that the claim that the "problem drinker" label is less offensive to some than the label of "alcoholic" is unfounded. 5 Tables, 39 References. ¶ Longitudinal data from self-report questionnaires completed by 1,270 NJ adolescents at ages 15, 18, & 21 are used to explore relationships among 11 problem behaviors & the stability of problem behaviors from middle adolescence to early adulthood. In addition, investigated is how well this cluster of problem behaviors at ages 15 & 18 predicts later drug problems at age 21. Although data support the existence of a problem behavior syndrome in terms of the clustering of certain problem behaviors at various points in the life cycle, the constellation of problems varies by gender, & the associations among problem behaviors over time are unstable. Further, the predictors of problem drug use at early periods of development are different from those at later periods & are different for males & females. Thus, the focus of drug abuse prevention programs will have to be aimed at the age & gender appropriate predictors. 4 Tables, 55 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ A model of vulnerability & protective factors is tested via analysis of survey data from a multiethnic sample of 1,289 urban NY adolescents, ages 11-13. The criterion variable was a composite score for cigarette, alcohol, & marijuana use. Multiple regression analyses indicate that vulnerability factors (negative life events, negative affect) were related to a higher level of substance use, & protective factors (parent emotional & instrumental support, academic & adult competence, positive affect) were related to a lower level of substance use; peer competence was positively related to substance use in a multivariate model. Implications for theories of substance use & primary prevention are discussed. 5 Tables, 4 Figures, 1 Appendix, 75 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Effective recovery from alcoholism demands commitment from both partners in a marriage. Here, fieldwork data obtained at a chemical dependency unit in Tusla, Okla, are used to examine how 28 couples with an alcoholic partner progressed through recovery & how they achieved their goals conjointly. Specifically, it is investigated whether spouses of alcoholics conformed to the same stages as indicated by the Model of Recovering Alcoholics' Behavior Stages & Goal Setting (Wing, D. M., "Goal Setting and Recovery from Alcoholism," Archives of Psychiatric Nursing, 1991, 5, 3, 178-184), & to learn the interactive effects of alcoholics' & spouses' stages. ¶ The relationship between lifestyle patterns & substance abuse is explored via interviews with 218 African-American males (mean age = 17) from the inner-city Baltimore, Md, area. Lifestyles were measured by 4 cluster variables: school attendance, employment status, church attendance, & delinquency. The validity of these clusters was measured by: organizational involvement, spirituality, self-esteem, & friend's drug use. Respondents also rated their own recent substance abuse. Results suggest that involvement in meaningful instrumental organization & activities may help prevent substance abuse among urban African-American youth. Results also indicate the utility of the multivariate lifestyle approach for understanding substance abuse, emphasizing interaction & compensation among behaviors. 5 Tables, 35 References. ¶ The interplay between social contacts, age at migration, & personal well-being of elderly Hispanics is assessed. Data from the 1988 National Survey of Hispanic Elderly People (N = 2,019 Mexican, Cuban, & Puerto Rican Americans age 65+) reveal that the difficulties associated with immigration late in life often serve to undermine an older person's morale & to interfere with the ability to perform the basic daily activities of living. Moreover, there are significant group differences in the use of community social resources; eg, older Cuban Americans appear to benefit tremendously from living in ethnic enclaves that largely reproduce the culture of origin. 4 Tables, 1 Chart, 1 Appendix, 34 References. Two methods of first contact–a telephone call to schedule a home visit & an unscheduled visit to the household–& 3 modes of questionnaire presentation were used. Analysis of the effectiveness of these strategies for recruitment reveals no difference in participation between method of first contact or mode of questionnaire presentation Agreement to participate was, however, significantly higher when first contact was made by visiting the home (81% vs 55%). 3 Tables, 16 References. ¶ An interview survey of 500 elderly Bermudans revealed their levels of social integration & caregiving, which were then compared with those of seniors in other developed countries. Findings show that most seniors were socially well-connected, although whites & older Bermudans had smaller networks; compared to a community sample from Winnipeg, Manitoba, the Bermudan respondents (Rs) were more satisfied. Health was a major predictor of life satisfaction, & good functioning of high self-esteem. Social support was not related to well-being, presumably because almost all Rs had strong social ties. Although 70% needed assistance with at least 3 activities of daily living, they turned to informal networks first for assistance. Overall, the Bermudan seniors' profiles were similar to seniors in other developed countries, except for their stronger social ties. 3 Tables, 43 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Prompted by the need for more skilled senior volunteers, enabling them to play a more effective role in developing & maintaining community programs across Canada to serve the increasing population of retired persons, a leadership & personal development program was established. Of 24 retirees (ages 58-73) enrolled in the program, 18 completed it. A case study narrative evaluating the program is derived from a continuous participant observation record & the evaluator's summary impressions following each session, formal workshop evaluations, & pre- & posttest ability to express ideas comfortably & solve problems in a group. Findings reveal the diversity within the group & demonstrate the effectiveness of the training model in meeting participants' needs regardless of entering level of leadership skill. More experienced leaders served as role models to potential leaders & developed the ability to support others & to share the leadership. ¶ Questionnaire & interview data collected from 365 elderly people are used to explore whether the relation between major life events & physical health status in the elderly has been inaccurately portrayed because measures of these variables were confounded. Two potential sources of confounding include the extent to which the life events-illness relationship is contaminated by certain types of life event list items, & influenced by prior health status. Findings confirm that, as with younger samples, when a relation between life events & health status measures in elderly samples is observed, much of it is due to health-related item confounding. Results suggest that using scores confounded with health-related & subjective events may obscure life events-well-being associations that may be obtained when only objective events are used. It is concluded that when retrospective reports of life events are significant predictors of health status, they account for only a small proportion of the variance in outcome measures of health status. Furthermore, a substantial portion of this relation can be attributed to relations with health-related events & with prior health status. 2 Tables, 18 References. Adapted from the source document. In-depth interviews conducted with a snowball ımple of 150 persons ages 85+ drawn from municipal voting rolls reveal ıat physical & social losses obstruct the maintenance of an active social etwork. Socially active individuals (about 50% of the sample) are ealthier & more functionally fit. La Gory, Mark & Fitzpatrick, Kevin (Dept Sociology U Alabama, Birmingham 35294), The Effects of Environmental Context on Elderly Depression, Journal of Aging and Health, 1992, 4, 4, Nov, 459-479.

The impact of environmental variables (neighborhood & social netırk characteristics) on the expressed levels of distress among elderly mericans is assessed. Stress is highest among whites, females, the poor, e poorly educated, the less aged, & the functionally impaired, accordg to a 1986/87 survey of 725 adults ages 55+ living in 4 metropolitan unties of Ala. In addition, the likelihood of depressive symptoms is also lated to environmental dissatisfaction, limited social supports, & inaduate public transportation. Thus, as M. Transitions in age identities of persons age 40+ are investigated, based interviews conducted with 1,200 residents (67.3% completion rate) in Albany-Schenectady-Troy metropolitan area of NY, noting the efts of chronological age & poor health on older age identity. Findings nonstrate that having children is associated with a middle-aged (raththan young) identification, while not being married (largely due to lowhood or divorce) is associated with labeling oneself as old (rather n middle-aged). In comparing persons who identify themselves as ıng rather than middle-aged, & middle-aged rather than old, the older egory of people have less happiness & lower life satisfaction, suggestthat these transitions are experienced negatively. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, References. Aging thus becomes the integration of past experience & present events in the framework of a continuous self. It is argued that different styles of aging derive from specific personality configurations. Results indicate that: the greater the number of companions & kin, the less likely the elderly are to live & eat alone; males, those with higher income, & those who are older are less likely to live & eat alone; & those who live alone but eat with others are more likely to be females of lower income & higher education than are the elderly who both live & eat with others. 3 Tables, 23 References. ¶ Data from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Supplementary Homicide Report, 1976-1987, are drawn on to document patterns of homicide between opposite gender relational partners, comparing rates between couples in marital & nonmarital relationships. Results indicate that the homicide rate for married couples declined somewhat during this period, although the drop in the rate of wives killing husbands was greater than that of husbands killing wives. However, homicides involving unmarried couples followed a very different pattern: whereas the lethal victimization rate for men in unmarried relationships varied unsystematically, the rate of unmarried women being killed by their male partners increased significantly. Findings demonstrate the importance of disaggregating homicide data by gender & relationship type. 10 Figures, 47 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A criminal career (CC) is a longitudinal sequence of offenses committed by an individual. A key feature of the CC approach is its emphasis on the development of explicit mathematical models & the testing of quantitative predictions about offending. CC research in the UK has led to advances in knowledge about prevalence, the age-crime curve, individual offending frequencies, onset, desistance, career duration, continuity, & specialization in offending. Implications for criminological knowledge & criminal justice policies are reviewed, & it is suggested that future research study more CC features (eg, co-offending) & collect data using prospective longitudinal self-reports as well as official records. 4 Tables, 33 References. It is argued that Foucault's characterization is a partial one, which does not register the intellectual & institutional changes that have shaped the modern subject. ¶ A study of the relationship between drugs & homicide is undertaken to address the need for a uniform & comprehensive definition of drug relatedness & for routine & systematic collection of data about the drug relatedness of homicide. The framework posits that drugs & violence are related psychopharmacologically, economic compulsively, & systemically. Findings from data collected via police records (study 1) & a police-administered instrument (study 2) on 2 different samples of homicides in NY (N = 1,768 & 414, respectively) indicated that the 2 most common types of drug-related homicide were psychopharmacological & systemic, & that very few were motivated by the compulsive need to get money for drugs. The results suggest that common assumptions about drug-related homicide are incorrect or exaggerated, & that existing police records are generally inadequate for the purpose of documenting complex drugs/crime/violence relationships. It is concluded that researchers can work with an enlightened police department to modify data collection procedures in a way that does not interfere with the law enforcement function. 27 References. ¶ A new methodology for describing crime statistics reported in the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Uniform Crime Reports is developed. After discussing current methods used to present these statistics, a model based on the scaling of intelligence used in differential psychology is applied to a rescaling of reported crime occurrences in 76 of the largest US cities in 1989. A profile of victimization quotients is generated that allows for more detailed analyses of crime patterns & covariances than do other reporting methods. The crime quotients are then examined in relation to 4 city structural characteristics–municipal expenditures, police service expenditures, % of minority population, & population density. Psychometric & practical issues associated with the new scaling system are discussed. 18 Tables, 3 Figures, 16 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Research has demonstrated that it is very difficult to describe the sequences of cause & effect linking the deterioration of urban neighborhoods to changes in their crime levels. However, three distinct explanations have been deployed regarding the deterioration of the public housing estate in GB: (1) the role of estate design in fostering defensive behavior among residents; (2) the decentralization of housing services & management; & (3) the concentration of social disadvantage. In addition to the interrelationship between these possible causal factors, also explored is the impact of the internal dynamics of community change on estates. Secondary data suggest that tendencies within the culture of an estate to provide opportunities for criminality are influenced by the contextual factors of design, social mix, & management quality, their interaction over time producing particular patterns of victimization & criminality. Findings illustrate the importance of population change in affecting the community dynamics of a neighborhood &, consequently, the crime it experiences. 4 Tables, 46 References. S. Most of those charged with violations of the state Medi-Cal law resided or worked in the "Little Saigon" city of Westminster, home of the largest population of Vietnamese outside of Vietnam. Using cultural conflict postulates, & relying on 60+ interviews in the community, it is explained that the practices were often direct adaptations of home country procedures. The shame of the community was intense & resulted in a deterioration of relationships between the medical practitioners & patients. The enforcement effort is criticized as an unnecessarily dramatic round-up of a discernible group of ethnic professionals who could have been taken into custody in a more usual fashion. 40 References. ¶ Interview data are used to examine the earnings & legitimate & illegitimate activities of 186 probationers in Washington, DC, who acknowledged a recent history of drug dealing. The findings show that, among dealers who are caught by the criminal justice system, drug selling is a much more profitable activity than are legitimate occupations, both on an hourly basis & in total monthly earnings. However, drug dealing still does not appear to launch this population on a path to high incomes, given the pyramidal nature of drug dealing which ensures that many hundreds earn the much more modest incomes reported. The results also indicate that drug dealing appears to be a far more financially rewarding activity than other crimes, & that most persons charged with drug selling are currently employed. It is speculated that those who want to keep their risks moderate combine legitimate employment with drug selling; the job may be a form of risk diversification, & may also help when a convicted dealer faces sentencing. The findings suggest that creating jobs, even relatively high-paying jobs, may do little to reduce willingness to participate in drug markets, at least in Washington, DC. 5 References. ¶ Historically, the South has been characterized by high homicide rates relative to other regions in the US. A review of the literature reveals disparate findings among extant studies exploring the Southern culture of violence thesis & its applicability to crime rates. Here, methodological problems of these studies are corrected, in an investigation of violen crime rates at three levels of aggregation–cities, metropolitan areas, & states–& across three decennial census periods–1960, 1970, & 1980,–using data drawn from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Uni form Crime Reports. Focus is on the generalizability of the Southern cul ture of violence thesis to other violent index crimes. In addition, it is ex plored whether the Southern regional effects persist over time &, if so whether there is a diminishing effect of region. The results provide evi dence for the existence of a Southern culture that supports situation specific types of violence (ie, defensive acts) rather than violence in gen eral. Furthermore, the findings provide mixed support that cultural ef fects diminish over time. 4 Tables, 60 References. Adapted with permis sion from Academic Press. ¶ Published data are drawn on to examine the impact of macroeconomic conditions & social control policies on changes in crime & imprisonment rates 1962-1988 in Canada. Informed by political economy theories, it is suggested that in the context of debilitating economic conditions, government policy becomes enmeshed in law & order & welfare strategies that emphasize greater policing, more incarceration, & increased use of placative forms of control. Results of time-series autocorrelation analysis generally support the hypotheses that both coercive & placative forms of control & fiscal distress occasion greater rates of crime & imprisonment. The high crime rate had often been attributed to reasons that disregard the conflict between the Aboriginal & white cultures. Despite the rapid ascendance of deterrence theory & other rational-choice interpretations of criminal behavior during the 1970s, no empirical research was conducted on the criminal decision making of serious offenders. Reported here are ethnographic data obtained during pre- & postrelease interviews (N = 60 & 46, respectively) with a sample of persistent property offenders in Tenn. Salient features of the criminal decision-making processes employed by respondents are identified, showing how their utilities are shaped & sustained by lifestyle characteristics. It is suggested that offenders' efforts to acquire the financial & social capital needed to enhance, sustain, or restore enjoyment of this lifestyle may generate a bounded rationality in which they discount or ignore the formal risks of crime. 42 References. Negative criminal opportunity-related positive criminal motivation-related effects are found at the aggregate vel, but these vary among age groups & are more evident for white th for African-American arrest rates. ¶ The perception of criminology in the broader intellectual communit as a very practical, down-to-earth, applied discipline, in which radica tendencies appear outside the mainstream, is explored. The role that uto pias have played accounts for the absence of either a settled stock o knowledge (theoretical or empirical) or an accepted set of methods in th discipline, & for criminology's legendary fractious, argumentative na ture. Questionnaire data from a cohort of 92 delinquents in 4 Montreal, ebec, youth shelters & 352 nondelinquents from 2 high schools are d to compare their friendship characteristics. Results show that: (1) inquents have more friends, including those of the opposite sex, than nondelinquents; (2) whereas the majority of nondelinquents form endships in school, delinquents tend to make friends outside of school; (3) delinquents & nondelinquents cultivate friendships with equivalent levels of intimacy & attachment, a finding that challenges previous positions regarding the affectless & fragile character of delinquent endships. The hypothesis is advanced that it is the greater incidence of nflict that characterizes the friendships of delinquents that deprives em of social skills & psychological well-being associated with nondelinquent adolescent friendship. 2 Tables, 1 Figure, 33 References. Questionnaire responses & official records of 139 Hispanic & 300 African-American males in grades 6-8 at 4 Chicago, Ill, inner-city schools are analyzed to construct incremental measures of gang involvement & delinquency. Scale sequence & regression analysis suggest that different social processes operate in gang involvement for the 2 populations. In both sets of cross-sectional data, the fitting of linear structural models shows gang involvement to be an effective post hoc estimator of delinquency for these youth, whereas delinquency is not an effective estimator of gang involvement. 5 Tables, 48 References. ¶ Multivariate techniques were used to examine two hypotheses regarding the phenomenon of youth involvement in Satanism: (1) Satanic involvement has an etiology in common with other youthful deviance; & (2) Satanists possess certain characteristics that differentiate them from non-Satanists. Findings of interviews conducted over a 6-month period in 1989 at the reception center of the Texas Youth Commission in Brownwood (N = 530 males (Ms) & females (Fs), ages 10-17) reveal a Satanic profile of a white M or F, with a higher level of imagination & intelligence, who seeks a sense of control over the events in his or her life. Although youths involved in Satanism are as delinquent as other youths, they are less apt to have seriously delinquent friends, suggesting that this type of occult activity attracts only certain kinds of youth. 3 Tables, 41 References. ¶ Using an analytical framework guided by lifestyle/routine activities theories, the relationships between adolescent activity involvement & the risk of assault & robbery victimization are explored, drawing on data from 2 large national surveys conducted 1976-1987. Analysis indicates that certain adolescent activities are related to risk of violence: youth who engage in delinquent activities experience the highest risk of assault & robbery victimization. However, there are very few conventional activities that protect adolescents from victimization net of background factors (eg, gender, race, family structure) or offending levels. Implications of these findings for violent victimization prevention programs among adolescents & for lifestyle/routine activities theories of victimization are considered. 3 Tables, 2 Appendixes, 34 References. ¶ The correlation between peer relations & adolescent problem behaviors, especially delinquency & substance abuse, is explored by moving beyond the traditional measurement of peer bonding & exploring the nature of peer relationships between the individual & his or her involvement with & commitment to delinquent peers. Interview data from the Puerto Rican Adolescent Survey (N = 1,077 males residing in South Bronx, NY) indicate that peer relationships among delinquents provide a sense of group belongingness, but have none of the other attributes linked to supportive friendships. Results reinforce previous research as to the strong connection among peer relationships, delinquent peers, & adolescent delinquency. It is suggested that program intervention services increase the beneficial impact of friends' support on the individual's social behavior & reduce the negative impact of association with deviant peers. 2 Tables, 17 References. ¶ The conventional Norwegian criminological wisdom, common since the 1960s, that research into traits associated with young offenders is futile stems from the notion that, while there is a certain amount of crir nality in everyone, only individuals with a specific profile are pursued law enforcement. After noting possible reasons for the enduring populi ity of this belief, evidence from international research is cited disputi profile criteria. It is shown that juvenile delinquents are heterogeneo in nature & origins. The homogeneous youthful offender is a myth. 4 T bles, 1 Appendix, 29 References. To determine the feasibility & appropriateness of providing means-ested financial assistance to informal caregivers of the elderly, it is imortant to assess whether they consider support of the disabled a governnent responsibility as well as a possible stigma. Results of a survey of 155 caregivers of disabled veterans age 65+ who receive Veterans Administration disability allowances (Aid & Attendance) indicate that car-givers feel the government is primarily responsible for supporting the ong-term disabled who are cared for at home. For the most part, these aregivers did not feel stigmatized or uncomfortable receiving meansested government assistance to support in-home care. An important implication of this study is that financial support can be a workable compoent of an integrated service delivery system to support informal caregivng. 2 Tables, 27 References. 6 are analyzed, & the results compared with similar studies from oth- countries. Each respondent's potential social network is measured in ns of household composition, marital status, number of living chil- n, & frequency of visits from family, friends, & neighbors; instrumen- support is measured in terms of reported needs for help with specific s & the main source of help. Results indicate that members of the endent elderly person's social network vary in the amount of instru- ntal help they provide, with family members being the most frequent rce of help, & that the role of the informal sector of caregiving is sub- ntially greater than that of formal caregiving services. Findings show t those who attended day centers during their final year of life tended be females age 75+ who lived alone, & had suffered from a number long-term symptoms & restrictions. Respondents indicated that, in at st another 11% of cases, it would have been helpful if the deceased had ended day centers, because it would have given the caregiver a much eded respite. On the other hand, the reason most frequently cited by egivers to explain nonattendance was the deceased's lack of interest, ich indicates some conflict between goals & motives of care providers those for whom they care. 4 Tables. ¶ Structured interviews were conducted with 50 residents (mean age = 80.9 years) of a continuing care retirement community (CCRC) to assess friendship & social interaction among them. Results of these & of partic- ipant observation indicate that residents have social networks on average, of 8.2 members, comprising kin (2.46), nonkin residing in the CCRC (3. 94), & nonkin residing elsewhere (1.76). The majority (75%) relied pri- marily on others in the CCRC for regular social activity, & well elderly provided assistance & support to frail elderly. Family members were the preferred source of confidant relationships. Age was not related to the size of nonkin networks in the CCRC; however, older residents reported fewer social ties to nonkin living elsewhere. ¶ The ways in which social support operates to promote or protect well-being are examined by employing a revised stress buffer model that: studies life events singly rather than as part of aggregate measures of life-event stress; offers greater attention to the efficacy of specific types of social support with regard to specific life events; & identifies event-specific outcomes in addition to examining more global psychological consequences. This model is applied to telephone interview data collected from 12,226 households in Ky to investigate the buffering properties of 6 types of social support associated with 4 psychological consequences of criminal victimization. Results demonstrate that effects of the perceived support measure were more pervasive than those of the received support measures. Perceived support consistently exhibited buffering effects, protecting both violent & property crime victims against various symptoms they would have otherwise experienced. ¶ Behavior problems, social competence, & cognitive functioning of 53 sexually abused black girls ages 5-16 in Ill were assessed to explore variability in the degree of dysfunction resulting from such abuse. Results indicate that internal, subject variables affect the demonstrated degree of dysfunction: internalizing dysfunction is positively related to cognition-related variables (intellectual function, academic achievement, & age); parent-reported self-blame for the abuse is associated with high levels of intellectual, academic, & emotional distress; externalizing dysfunction is associated with low social competence; & sexual acting out is associated with emotional distress, behavioral disturbances, & low social competence. 4 Tables, 17 References. ¶ The structure & nature of altruistic fear ((AF) ie, worrying about the safety of others, particularly family members) in households is examined using survey data from a sample of 865 residents in Dallas, Tex. Respondents were questioned about their fear for other household members, prior victimization experiences, & neighborhood perceptions. The results indicate that: AF is a common form of fear that is no less prevalent than personal fear; children are the most common object of fear in households; AF in households has a symmetric structure; suffering a property victimization increases AF among women but not men; & AF does not affect the use of home security measures, but is correlated with weapons purchases among men. 3 Tables, 14 References. ¶ The validity of a measurement strategy that distinguishes between the social costs of illegal acts & those produced by legal sanctions is empirically evaluated using data from a subsample of a 1985-1987 national panel survey of violence between married or cohabiting partners (N = 325). Respondents were asked to estimate the likelihood of assault costs compared to arrest costs, as well as social costs, eg, loss of attachments, loss of respect from significant others, & loss of self-respect. Findings suggest that perceived arrest costs, more than assault costs, significantly influence deterrence for this type of illegal behavior. Implications for further research & policy are discussed. 2 Tables, 33 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Interview data collected in 1988 from 37 security sites (ie, a place under the authority of a security company) are used to explore the period immedidately following an environmental jolt (ie, a major policy shift) specifically, the impact of various factors on: (1) the extent to which the jolt was perceived as being potentially disruptive, & (2) changes in organizational strain & proactive & reactive coping strategies. The policy shift was more likely to be seen as potentially disruptive where there were fewer personnel & monetary resources available & where the disjunction between previous strategic resource commitments & the demands of the new policies was greatest. In the immediate postjolt period, the impact of prior strategic resource commitments is outweighed by the intensity of the jolt & increases in the level of organizational strain. A mix of proactive & reactive coping strategies were enacted to increase the chances of both short- & long-term adaptability. 2 Tables, 13 Refer-

The purveyors of social knowledge, including the social sciences, in the Philippines from the Spanish colonial period to the present have borne much responsibility in the task of delineating what is considered as dangerous & subversive, on one hand, & permissible, on the other. More importantly, they have served, either willingly or unwillingly, to legitimize & validate the existing political order by elaborating on that order's ideological basis, contributing to the formulation & implementation of policies, refusing to challenge the political order, or simply being acquiescent to its presence. The Philippine experience reinforces the observation that objectivity is relative to the paradigm to which the practitioner belongs. In the wake of the postbehavioral movement in the social sciences, the social scientist's role in the Philippines, like that of his or her counterparts in the West, is influenced not so much by the drive to be objective as by the need to choose between competing values that would ultimately determine his or her relevance to society. Biancoli, Romano (Via Antonio Codronchi 110, I-48100 Ravenna Italy), Radical Humanism in Psychoanalysis, UM Contemporary Psychoanalysis, 1992, 28, 4, Oct, 695-731.

¶ It is shown that Erich Fromm's psychoanalytic theory conceives the individual as encompassing innumerable threads of the social fabric & socioeconomic & cultural dynamics. The humanistic premise is based on the concept of human nature as characteristic of all humanity, allowing each individual to personally experience the experience of others. For Fromm, the specific nature of the analyst's offer to the patient is competence to "be" the latter, while also being oneself. Radical humanism & the being mode are the conditions for the correlation "center-to-center," which signifies experiencing what another individual is experiencing. Understanding a person is like understanding a poem. Psychoanalysis is a dialogic & maieutic art, which examines the life of the patient & seeks to help him or her develop the capacity for love. 41 References. Modified AA

¶ D. Davidson's principle of the anomalousness of the mental ("Mental Events," reprinted in Davidson, D., Essays on Actions and Events, Oxford Oxford U Press, 1980 [1970], 207-225) was instrumental in discrediting once-popular versions of mind-brain reductionism. Here, it is argued that a novel account of intertheoretic reduction, which does not require the sort of cross-theoretic bridge laws that Davidson's principle rules out, allows a version of mind-brain reductionism that is immune from Davidson's challenge. A second worry about reductionism, also based on Davidson's principle, that survives this response is also addressed. It is contended that new reductionists should revise some significant details of the program, particularly the conception of theories, to circumvent this more potent Davidson-inspired worry. 20 References. ¶ Labeling theory is the best approach to the study of criminal motivation from the standpoint of sociology of knowledge because it introduces the concept of relativity into the definition of crime, showing that crimes occur through interaction processes where actors demand categories of deviance. The motives of crime can be removed from the realm of the vicious circle of crime background by hypothesis once the implications for the definition of crime are incorporated into motives. It becomes possible to say that the motives reveal themselves after criminal offenses are committed, not before, as is commonly maintained. Motives must be treated not as mental facts, but social facts, since they are constructed within the interpretational paradigms of daily life in accordance with a common understanding of the meaning of human behavior. 17 References. ¶ Historically, liberalism grew up as a movement favoring individualism over conservatism, or loyalty to the traditional values of the national culture. It is contended that the liberal mind sees society as the spontaneous product of free individuals, rather than as a delicate fabric nurtured by time. The main driving force of the liberal is opposition to the conservative concept of nations & races as discrete entities with their own distinctive being & reality. Because of the liberal's belief in myth rather than reality, it is argued one can never hope to convert the liberal mind. L. Dorn

Horowitz, Irving Louis (Rutgers U, New Brunswick NJ 08903), Morris Raphael Cohen and the Classical Liberal Tradition, UM Partisan Review, 1992, 59, 3, summer, 469-473.

¶ An examination, through reflections on the late Morris Raphael Cohen, of how liberalism as a philosophy & ideology in the US has changed in the past half century. Essentially, classical liberalism–in contrast to present-day liberalism–is distinguished by a series of measures: (1) belief in equity as a function of education instead of as an imposed government solution; (2) belief in achievement orientation rather than ascriptive criteria for measuring success; & (3) dedicated opposition to all forms of totalitarianism–Right & Left–as measured by belief in the intrinsic worth of individual human beings. Cohen serves as a first class exemplar of the classical liberal imagination. Along with a handful of others, Cohen set the agenda for liberal reform in a host of areas–legal reform, emphasis on scientific reasoning, racial & religious toleration, etc–that provided the intellectual rationale for a wide array of legislative reforms & judicial decisions that took place in the post-WWII period. In the linkage of education, science, logic, judicial reform, & religious freedom, Cohen carried liberalism to the threshold of pluralism & the consensus that followed the conclusion of the war. The shift in liberalism to meet the specific conditions of race, gender, & class considerations can be best understood when highlighted in regard to the older panoply of considerations that formerly occupied, some may say constrained, the liberal imagination Modified AA

Hösle, Vittorio (U Tubingen, D-7400 1 Federal Republic Germany), The Third World as a Philosophical Problem, UM Social Research, 1992, 59, 2, summer, 227-262.

¶ An attempt is made to clarify the concept of "Third World," addressing ethical problems inherent in the relations between the First & Third Worlds. The actual Third World is the result of an asynchrony between cultures, which, though always present, increased dramatically with the development of modern technology & universalistic ethics. As a consequence of Europe's impact, traditional cultures have lost their organic unity: intrinsic asynchrony has become their fate. The general ethical problem regarding the relations between different cultures leads to the universalism-relativism controversy, which was debated as early as the sixteenth century. A middle way is proposed between extreme relativism (which must deny that there are any norms for intercultural relations) & abstract universalism (which cannot deal with cultures without a universalistic ethics). ¶ D. W. Winnicott's transitional process involves the creation of "an intermediate area of experience" out of which creativity emerges, in which the tension between objectivity & subjectivity is temporarily overcome, & inner & outer worlds momentarily fuse (Maturational Process and the Facilitating Environment, London: Hogarth, 1965; & Playing and Reality, New York: Routledge, 1971). In this drive to go beyond the dualism of objectivity & subjectivity, Winnicott carries into psychoanalysis a theme that has dominated much current philosophy of science & is proposing nothing less than a psychoanalytic theory of culture. Winnicott uses the term "illusion" for this psychological space, thereby reframing illusion from a synonym for error into a source of truth. A detailed discussion of several contemporary philosophers of science draws out the epistemological implications of Winnicott's discussion & shows how illusion (in Winnicott's sense) is, in fact, a source of knowledge. 18 References. ¶ A discussion of ultimate reality & its irreducible meaning demands a broad-based interdisciplinary perspective, since the theme is not limited solely to the disciplines of philosophy & religion. Information accessed from several fields is drawn on to critique a long-standing model of ultimate reality–the "perennial philosophy"–which posits an Absolute Unity as not only the source of all existence, but coextensive with it, as well; ie, the Absolute is both immanent & transcendent. The inconsistencies of this particular vision of the real are contrasted with a more coherent scheme based on an a priori ontological dualism. A theory of inherent duality, however, has a fundamental deficiency, in that it is necessarily incomplete. The difficulty lies in the inability to characterize, in any declarative statement, the nature of an Other whose very existence can only be affirmed by recognition of the innate bipolarity manifest in & through the human condition. Given the claim of an ontological dualism jointly responsible for universal creation, it is asserted that the evolutionary drive toward enhancement of human potential on the physical, mental, & spiritual levels is a natural feature of the teleological consequences of this alternative metaphysical principle. 32 References. ¶ Sociology can benefit from the dialectical conjunction of three approaches to the study of emotions. The clinical & theoretical perspectives involved in the psychoanalytic, socioanalytic, & phenomenological approaches to such analysis are illustrated by biographical case studies, citing Sigmund Freud's & Jean-Paul Sartre's work. Love, tenderness, jealousy, shame, & guilt are best described as biosocialpsycho phenomena. According to psychoanalysis, affects are the result of psychological & sexual conflicts of childhood, while in socioanalysis, the family mediates the development of the individual subjected to social contradictions. Finally, the phenomenological angle considers affect as a production, a personalizing elaboration of a subject constituted by assuming & overcoming objective determinations. 9 References. ¶ The manifestations of reactions here termed "archotic," following Casper Schmidt (term undefined; reference not provided), to social trauma in the US as evidenced by images in recent films are examined, arguing that an approximately fifteen-year time lag occurs between the original trauma & the archotic reaction, a process here called the "Adowa cycle." The US is currently experiencing an Adowa cycle stemming from the debacle of the Vietnam war. The early phase of this cycle, as examplified by the images of the films, Batman & Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles, portrays a crumbling world in which evil triumphs over good, & has direct parallels to the US defeat in Vietnam. The middle phase, as evidenced by the films, Home Alone, Ghost, & Kindergarten Cop, conveys images of unfamiliarity, overcoming fear, & transformation, & has parallels with events in the Persian Gulf. The final phase, represented by the films, Sleeping with the Enemy & Silence of the Lambs, contains images of evil associated with masculinity & rationality & the desire to get even, & may portend the coming of an antirational movement in the guise of New Age spirituality. 1 Appendix. Proceeding from Pierre Bourdieu's field theory of science & notion of the "invisible hand" role of intellectuals presented in "The Peculiar History of Scientific Reasons" (see SA 39:4/91X9283), attention is focused on his seemingly disenchanted view of intellectual autonomy critically reinterpreted in a minimally normative & thus performative direction. His "real politics" of reason should be replaced by an ethical politics of knowledge, sewing the good & bad sides of intellectual professionalism more closely together than traditional ethics of knowledge would find comfortable. 48 References. An exploration of what it means, at least at the personal level, to think psychoanalytically. Sigmund Freud's personality, the analytic relationship, & questions of theory are examined to suggest how the "middle group"-including D. W. Winnicott, M Milner, P. Casement, & others-provides a consistent object relations theory of the personality, one that presupposes a convergence between psychoanalysis & hermeneutics, but does not reduce the former to the latter. In addition, it is argued that the evidence for psychoanalytic propositions that can be gathered inside & outside the clinical session must be differentiated, because the former is necessarily context-bound & nonrepeatable, while the latter can be subject to empirical corroboration. 55 References. De Marco, Ettore, Montaigne quattrocento anni dopo (Four Hundred Years after Montaigne), UM La Critica Sociologica, 1992, 102, Apr-July, 137-140. (ITA)

¶ To commemorate the four-hundredth anniversary of the death of French humanist philosopher Michel de Montaigne, a special edition was published of his Saggi ([Studies], Milan: Adelphi, 1992). This book is not only a self-portrait, revealing considerable erudition, but also a deep reflection on the human condition. The original version was written in the French vernacular, rather than in Latin, a novelty for the time, circa 1580. By 1595 a third expanded edition was published posthumously. Key themes include: the other self within us; the fluidity of forms of existence; cultural relativism; & issues of health, sickness, & death. M. ¶ Jürgen Habermas's presentation of nature as an instrumental structure, as well as his devaluation of nature in the composition of the lifeworld, proves to be the major flaw in his theory of modernity. His theory leaves no opportunity for revision in light of the crisis of the physical environmental & human ecology, the incursion of ecological ethics into the process of production, & the upsurge of naturalism in culture in general. New demands on the instrumental structures of the system & on the life world, dictated by the motif of naturalism, problematize the fundamental premises of his theory. Also, Habermas's theory of modernity is contrasted to Alberto Melucci's, whose analysis clarifies some of the terrains of the concept of naturalism. ¶ Two dichotomies in the analysis of time conceptions & their relation to historiography are discussed: the absolute-relational dichotomy, arguing that historiography has overemphasized the absolute conception of time when establishing chronological systems; & (2) the dichotomy between time as fundamentally an A- or a B-series in J. M. E. MacTaggart's sense (The Nature of Existence, Vol. II-V, Cambridge: CUP, 1927), claiming that the B-series has gained an undeserved hegemony when historiography has attempted to model its conception of science on the natural sciences. Combination of the two dichotomies is explored, & it is concluded that historians should put more emphasis on the relational/A-series combination. 40 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A preliminary outline is provided of the way that resistance can be offered to the disciplining of human bodies by power-knowledges, eg, penology & psychoanalysis, as described by Michel Foucault. Such resistance, it is argued, can be conceptualized as rooted, not in a transcendental subject, but in the natural world–in particular, the ecological relationship between the human being & its physical surroundings. This point is developed in relation to James Gibson's elaboration of ecological psychology (eg, see The Ecological Approach to Visual Perception, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1979) & his notion of affordance–the organism's perception of objects in terms of its bodily capacities & limits. It is suggested that individuals can potentially "see" behavioral possibilities in their environment that contravene the prescriptions & proscriptions of power-knowledge. Idle walking & play are used to illustrate affordance as a resource for resistance. AA

¶ Two approaches to ideology that view it as a belief system & as a form of discourse are contrasted, & an argument is made for the latter. Viewing ideology as a discourse enables a more adequate account of the diversity of beliefs among members of an ideological movement, & also locates its causal power at the level of social conventions rather than within individual psychology. This theoretical discussion is linked with the case of Soviet-type societies, serving as the basis for a reinterpretation of ideology's role in the maintenance & more recent decline of these political systems. ¶ The Hegelian concept of rationality is proposed to answer the conte porary demands of the Western world. Differences between philosop cal, historical, & technoscientific rationality are addressed, as are th implications for the relationship between theory & practice, the subj tive & the objective, consciousness & reality, & the constitution of t epistemic & the practical subject. The technicoscientific rationality the capitalist West does not enable "educated" people to become me bers of a universal epistemic community, employing a critical rationali but limits knowers to those with accessibility to knowledge–the educ tional elite selected by class, ethnicity, etc. In Latin America, the curre educational process scarecely meets the regulatory ideal of individual c velopment & social transformation through critical reflection & creati ty. Kuroda, Yoshihiko, Transliterated title not available (Autonomy and the Concept of Region), Soshioroji, 1988, 33, 1, May, 32-4[illegible]. (JPN)

¶ In the 1960s, Japanese urban sociologists tried to analyze the expansion of metropolitan areas, assuming that they were all based around a single central city surrounding by several satellite cities. After 197[illegible], many metropolitan areas became multicentered. This was due to a greater move toward autonomy in the smaller surrounding cities, which now have a greater infrastructure than several decades ago, & should no longer be thought of as "bedroom" communities. Another factor is the increased participation of citizens of smaller cities in the local planning process, so they can take better advantage of community resources. It is therefore necessary to go beyond the idea of the metropolitan area & speak of the whole region, implying a network of independent units. 1 Table, 13 References. ¶ In exploring the narrative character of community, it is contended that narratives are central to social-scientific concerns. This position is articulated by discussing the nature of narratives, in which their collective & social character is emphasized, & by examining their relevance to the study of communities. These discussions are applied to empirical instances of land use decisions in Pa, opening areas of inquiry into the general topic of community studies with implications for contemporary theorizing regarding human settlements. The general analysis recognizes narratives as fundamental aspects of the cultural order &, drawing on Max Weber, regards that order (& consequently, narratives) as permanently linked with political & economic orders. P. Baumgartner, The Moral Order of a Suburb (New York: Oxford U Press, 1989 [see listings in IRPS No. 68]). These three books, which contribute to a study of urban communities, young gangs, & suburban peace, are analyzed in terms of the methods & style of field research employed, with particular attention to what each author tells about the building of communities. It is argued that Baumgartner's description of life in the suburb she studied was more balanced & reserved than those offered by Anderson–who lived among & cared about the persons he studied–or Jankowski–who jumped dangerously into the world of gangs. The risks & ethical dilemmas of "going naive" are too serious to ignore; the role of observer (not participant) should always take precedence in field research. 3 References. L. Dorn

A historical sketch shows that, in the Middle Ages, this area was the main cultural center of Croatia, but by 1991, the population was only 35.5% Croatian & 62% Serbian. Since the Serbs in this region are not threatened either by assimilation or emigration, & since this region is vital to Croatian transportation & communication corridors, there is no justification for secession. This would be paramount to a threat to the indigenous Croatians in territory that historically belonged to them. 3 Tables, 7 References. M. Meeks

Takahashi, Jumpei, Transliterated title not available (Commentaries on the Theme of the Symposium–Life Cycles of Metropolitan Regions and Regional Planning Conception), Soshioroji, 1988, 33, 1, May, 5-16. (JPN)

The aim here is to: (1) analyze changes in Japanese metropolitan regions in terms of a life-cycle model; (2) study the transition of national land policy in the post-WWII era, concentrating on the idea of regional planning; & (3) propose a normative concept of "region" suitable for regional planning. Analysis shows that the region was negatively viewed as a means to deal with issues occurring in each stage of a metropolitan area's life cycle. To form a positive concept of the region, it is important to avoid thinking of a local area in the sense of a metropolitan area. Instead, emphasis should be on a regional society that is a constituent element of the total society. This new concept of the region has the advantages of being comprehensive, intermediate, & flexible. Additionally, it shares some features common to both the metropolitan & local regions. 1 Table, 1 Graph, 9 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An ethnographic study of an Afro-American hustler living in a black ghetto in Chicago, Ill, begins with a physical description of the zone, a ghetto neighborhood punctuated with government-subsidized housing projects, liquor stores, & billboards. In-depth interviews with Rickey, a former professional boxer, detail his life as a professional hustler. Hustling covers a wide range of activities that require the implementation of a certain type of symbolic capital & skill to manipulate & deceive others &, when needed, to commit violence with shrewdness & charm for quick monetary gain. Examples include fencing stolen goods, gambling, craps pool, cards, drug trafficking, petty theft, stripping down cars, etc. The exact opposite of legitimate employment, hustling is a commonplace necessity in the ghetto, demanding street smarts, fast talking, playing it cool, & getting by one more day. The ghetto constitutes a dependent universe, in which the dog-eat-dog mentality is but one factor in producing a regular form of social entropy. Sidebars discuss ghetto demographics, a portrait of public school life, women in the zone, & language notes preceding the transcribed interview. 4 Photographs, 1 Appendix. J. Sadler ¶ Decentralization of the Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) Small Cities program in 1981 gave states great latitude in deciding how to allocate grant funds. Consequently, scholars expressed concern that, under state control, fewer CDBG funds would be expended for low- & moderate-income benefits via housing rehabilitation. Here, analysis of CDBG expenditures on the Small Cities program in Okla indicates a definite shift in spending priorities. Since 1982, Okla localities diverted CDBG funds primarily to infrastructure & economic development instead of housing-related activities, & channeled a larger amount of dollars into moderate- & median-income areas. As a result, the Small Cities program in Okla, under state control, was found to provide less direct & immediate housing aid to lower-income citizens. 2 Tables. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An overview of the idea sketched by the German social philosopher Ernst Bloch to overcome traditional logic by envisioning a social world full of contradictions & structurally open to different developments of the future. This theory aims at another approach focusing on multidimensional structuring of historical & societal situations, both given by the very simultaneity of the nonsimultaneous & the nonsimultaneity of the simultaneous in every sociohistorical time. It is argued that considering social tendencies in this manner might help social scientists making things that are still invisible progressively more & more visible. Given a rapidly changing social world in all Western societies, the actual societal situation is structurally fluctuating, & more than ever before in history, these societies within a permanently westernized new "one world" will bear enormous fluctuating processes, forming another civilization based on subjectivity, reflexiveness, responsiveness, & interpretation. All of this foreshadows a new social order by an overall "mental surplus" fluctuating at the very backstage of every society. Modified AA

By focusing on usable ignorance ...than usable knowledge, the development of a more realistic research agenda for policy studies can be facilitated. Here, it is shown that PA is part of a knowledge system that mandates, produces, structures, stores, distributes, & utilizes knowledge. The use of systematic mediation in the PA process is discussed, & an expected utility model of PA utilization is presented. It is concluded that the strategy of usable ignorance in tandem with recommendations in agenda setting & methodology development–offers a way to deal with the organized complexity of the knowledge system in which policy analysts work. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 47 References. The ADA's vague definition of "disabled" & its failure to adequately specify which groups of disabled workers are covered under the law are likely to result in heated social & legal clashes. Also problematic is the requirement that employers make reasonable accommodations for disabled workers. Speculations on the future consequences of the ADA are offered. 15 References. W. ¶ Discussed is the extent to which social science knowledge utilization is advantageous for policy making (PM). The process by which empirical instruments used in social science (ie, planning techniques, cost-effectiveness studies, program evaluation) have been introduced in PM is examined. It is shown that policymakers first utilized social science research results, then began using social science methodology & instruments, which generated the next phase, the appearance of critical studies of instruments used in PM. To illustrate this process, the use of technology assessment in controlling health care costs is discussed, & reflections are offered on what constitutes usable knowledge in PM. W. ¶ The impact of 1983 Okla legislation that raised the minimum drinking age for "weak" beer (3.2% or less alcohol content by weight) is investigated, comparing Likert-type scale responses from 10 samples of college students under age 21, 1981-1987 (total N = 4,572). Analysis reveals that quantity & frequency of consumption showed an increase in the period just before the law change & a decrease immediately following. Overall, however, the quantity-frequency index remained constant, & reports of problem drinking changed very little. Some adjustments were found in drinking locations, with students reporting less drinking in public places, eg, bars or restaurants, & more drinking in private places, eg, residence halls or homes. Policy implications of similar legislation designed to control drinking are discussed. 7 Figures, 20 References. Adapted from the source document. Khasiani, Shanyisa A., The Nature and Impact of Population Policy in Kenya, African Journal of Sociology, 1990, 3, 2, May, 44-60.

¶ High fertility, declining mortality, & rapid migration in the 1970s have contributed to Kenya's high population growth rate, & the outlook for the year 2000 suggests negative consequences for development. Government attempts to influence these parameters of growth have been less than successful because numerical targets & time tables have not been specified. Despite an antinatalist policy for more than three decades, & adequate knowlege of & access to family planning, the desire for large families due to socioeconomic & cultural factors has not diminished. Rural migration policies have not produced the desired levels of migration partly because of cultural attitudes toward attachment to the land; policies using development & growth centers to redirect migration toward small towns have been only moderately successful. In the absence of a level of economic development that reduces fertility & balances the distribution of population, Kenyan population policy needs to be integrated across fertility, mortality, & migration measures, aimed at specific demographic & geographical targets, & broadened to include a wider range of factors directly & indirectly implied in a population resource equation for the present & future. 40 References. ¶ Business incorporation is explored via an analysis of the turnpike movement in NY, 1797-1845. Turnpikes promised a solution to the problem of inadequate roads. Despite support from diverse capitalists, the public was reluctant to endorse turnpikes on grounds that they exemplified the evils of the private corporation & aristocracy. Public debate focused on disputes over legislative concessions to turnpike protesters. In response to the protesters, the legislature passed laws favorable to both local users & injurious to the financial viability of the companies. Merchants, landowners, & farmers struggled to finance turnpikes, believing that their construction would improve transportation, stimulate commerce, & raise land values. Reasons why many turnpike projects were never completed are discussed; those that were completed carried on in a manner that reflected their uncertain financial state. 66 References. ¶ A sociological interpretation is offered of the institutionalization of European Community agricultural policy, with special emphasis given to the survival chances for a strong agrarian sector. Since WWII there has been a steady tendency for small- & medium-sized family-owned farms to sell out to larger, more efficiently run, & highly specialized agricultural conglomerates. Increasingly, farming is controlled by outside political & economic forces. As a result, agriculture is becoming highly politicized on both the national & the international levels. Problems of community sovereignty are illustrated by the many conflicts within the agricultural sector. Special attention is given to issues of legitimacy & to social change inherent in these transformations. 79 References. Adapted from the source document. Special attention is paid to: (1) the appropriate level of protection; (2) price vs nonprice measures; (3) the role of targeting, selectivity, & uniformity; (4) the stability of incentives over time; & (5) the qualitative aspects of trade regimes. 1 Table, 1 Appendix, 21 References. ¶ Each European Community (EC) country has a pension plan ensuring the elderly relatively large benefits; however, the large differences between the form & content of the various national systems would make it difficult to harmonize these schemes. The current goal of convergence implies that a number of common goals will be undertaken by each nation to cooperate in anticipating future problems, especially financial ones. In the past, the large variety of options available for solving such problems, however, led to the opposite extreme of divergence. New proposals for coordinating the pension systems within the total framework of the social security system discussed since 1991 are reviewed. Although the juridical power of any recommendation issued by the EC is limited, the possibility exists that new policies could lead to a more highly socialized Europe. 10 References. ¶ Advances in technology in the late 1980s contributed to the greater use of employer drug testing in both the public & private spheres. The widespread acceptance of testing began with the perception of a pervasive drug problem in the workplace, & was encouraged by media publicity, pharmaceutical industry promotions, & the federal zero-tolerance drug policy. The more accurate, reliable, & inexpensive drug detection tests (gas chromatography/mass spectrometry, immunoassay) are now combined with high-security testing procedures to eliminate false-positive results. The growing drug testing industry is composed of pharmaceutical companies, testing laboratories, providers of ancillary goods & services, information/consultation services, & drug abuse treatment services, supported by federal agencies. Drug testing has rendered employees a new source of social control in US society. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Discussed is the importance of rigorous debate over sex-specific labor legislation, arguing for the need to protect women workers from excessive demands from their employers. The efforts of early industrial relations scholar Beatrice Webb–who upheld the need for sex-specific protection, & who in 1896 noted that proposed specific labor laws were opposed by a tacit but effective alliance compromising employers, free market economists, & liberal feminists–are used as a model. A similar alliance is shown to exist in Australia today, one that has been effective in the campaign to remove protection for women working in manual occupations. This recent successful but socially irresponsible campaign for the removal of minima in Australian manual handling laws is taken as a case study to demonstrate the nature of the modern tacit alliance, & the processes by which it has been successful, despite an absence of debate & despite the fact that many basic assumptions have not been rigorously investigated. Modern industrial relations analysts should recognize, as did Webb, that they have a responsibility to initiate & participate in debates over specific labor laws designed to protect workers. 3 Tables, 62 References. ¶ (For abstract of Part I, see SA 41:2/93Z8711.) Traditio argumentum respectus (tradition of respectful argumentation)–a principled system of assessing the validity of beliefs, opinions, perceptions, data, & knowledge–is worthy of practice & perpetuation in medical care, because assessments of validity are susceptible to incompleteness, incorrectness, & misinterpretation. Since the latter may lead to ambiguity, uncertainty, anxiety, & animosity among dialog participants (patients & physicians), objective analyses & criteria are desirable. A tradition of respectful argumentation maximizes objectivity & minimizes subjectivity as part of decision-making processes & preserves the integrity of the participants. During such discourse, one must always be cognizant of fallacious arguments–material, verbal, & formal fallacies–since they compromise the validity of assertions. Described is a new approach to solutions of bargaining problems, ie, a rule by which participants of a nonantagonistic game select, from the set of all feasible outcomes, a "fair" outcome. A diverse class of games is considered, & the selection in a concrete game is specified by the class under consideration. A partial ordering on each class of games is introduced, implying that this ordering is associated with the contributions of the participants to the game. The chosen solution depends on this ordering &, in particular, is monotonic with respect to it. Under preliminary axioms, an admissible monotonic solution is not unique, & the problem is to choose a single one. The rule for choosing such a solution is based on the maximum incentive of the participant with the maximum value of his contribution, but within the framework of postulated axioms, in particular, under the monotonicity condition. The latter condition implies that the solution is nontrivial. Focus is on the maximum incentive solution of the so-called Income Allocation Problem, & results related to the general scheme are surveyed. 3 Figures, 10 References. The relationship between institutionalization, economic sector, & patterns of industrial conflict were examined by analyzing strike settlement processes in the monopoly & competitive manufacturing sectors. Event-history analysis was used with the data from US Bureau of Labor Statistics Historical Work Stoppage file for the private sector from 1960-1989 to estimate strike settlement rates; the variables considered were contract status (initial negotiation, renegotiation, & mid-term), strike size, wage level, sector-specific unemployment, & Democratic party power in Congress. Strikes in initial negotiations, particularly in settings where the rules had widespread legitimacy, & where workers felt relatively powerful, were more difficult to settle; the difficulty was exacerbated when these characteristics occurred in the competitive setting. It is concluded that strikes occurring in different sectors & contexts vary in the strike settlement process. However, the use of resources & the continued reliance on strikes point out the limits of institutionalization. 2 Tables, 6 Figures, 39 References. Adapted from the source document.

Here, the connection of Lenin with vanguardism is challenged, arguing that such figures as Marx, Rosa Luxemburg, Antonio Gramsci, & Lenin followed a Western Marxist tradition that placed the life experience & struggle of the working class as the engine of revolutionary consciousness, & the class in general as the basic transformer of society. In Introduction to Herbert Marcuse, "On the Critique of Sociology," avid Norman Smith (U of Kansas, Lawrence) presents an overview of e origins of critical theory & chronicles the formation of the Frankfurt stit in Germany. Herbert Marcuse's transition to critical theory is dis- ssed, highlighting the influence of Georg Lukács. Following is a review ticle by Marcuse (originally published as "Sur Kritik der Soziologie")n the Critique of Sociology] in Die Gesellschaft: Internationale Revue für Sozialismus und Politik, Bd. 2 (Collected Works: International Review of Socialism and Politics), Berlin, 1931) on a book by Siegfried Landshut, Kritik der Soziologie. Freiheit und Gleichheit als Ursprungsproblem der Soziologie ([The Critique of Sociology. Freedom and Equality as Fundamental Problems of Sociology] Munich: Duncker & Humbolt, 1929). Discussion focuses on Landshut's presupposition of a "factual questionability of reality" that grounds & gives meaning to the historical formulation of the sociological problematic & to the authenticity of its claims. The conflict between human direction & worldly fulfillment is addressed, & it is demonstrated how this notion has guided sociological research since Lorenz von Stein & Karl Marx. Explored is the effectiveness of the hazardous & nuclear waste indus-/'s strategies to encounter local opposition to depository sitings. Survey ta & multiple regression techniques compare the relative levels of con-rn expressed by residents of Boyd County, Neb, selected as a waste dis-sal site, & of the state (N = 347 & 1,869, respectively). The level of ncern is found to be greatest among those living within the immediate unty, yet it is actually lowest, albeit most polarized, within the commu-ty closest to the proposed site. Conflict theory enhances an understand-g of these findings by suggesting that, within the most proximate com-unity, the level of concern is lowest for those citizens who stand to gain onomically from the facility but highest for those who do not stand to rive tangible gains from the facility. 3 Tables, 47 References. Arguing that the predominant approach of environmental sociology ES) to global change has been too narrow, several new perspectives are iggested. ES should give more attention to the social construction of en-ironmental knowledge, by building on & transcending the debates with-i the sociology of science. ES must also rethink its theories that give an-lytical priority to the nation-state & to national units of analysis. ¶ Unlike other social science & arts disciplines, history has been slow to develop an awareness of environmental issues. The popular conception of environmentalism tends to be apocalyptic, locating human existence within a set of ecological limits that are seen as having been only recently ruptured. This foreshortened perspective has misled historians. However, the discipline of history, at least in the UK, is ill-equipped to redress this. Different sectors are enclosed from each other, while a holistic approach is needed. Recent historical work on agriculture, ecology, nature conservation, environmental politics, & pollution is surveyed, & an immediate agenda for "greening" rural history is outlined. 66 References. Preoccupation with the destructive power & doubtfulness about the safety of nuclear power in the public mind undoubtedly increase these negative perceptions. (GER)

¶ To determine perceptions of ecological problems, interview & questionnaire data were obtained from 1,200 respondents (Rs) in the German- & Italian-speaking parts of Switzerland in spring 1989; special attention was given to problems of air pollution, traffic control, & damage to forests. Jürgen Habermas's theory of communicative action provides an explanation of the instrumental rationality evident in the survey results. Most Rs felt air pollution to be the biggest problem, & favored speed limits & gasoline price hikes to help control it. Cars & other technological products of the mass production economy are so essential to the Swiss lifestyle that Rs oppose any serious threats to their operation. This whole culture of working & consuming in a Fordist economic system leaves a distinct cultural & psychological impression on people. In contrast, alternatives suggested by the Share Community, a Swiss organization with 100+ members, include increased use of sailboats, bicycles, & an improved train system. Through communal ownership of the means of transportation, Share Community members enjoy lower individual costs, profiting from efficient usage of resources. However, the applicability of this success on a large scale is questioned. It is concluded that structures which increase ways to enhance communicative rationality provide a better chance for people to be environmentally responsible than do structures following the instrumental rationality of the Fordist model. 1 Table, 1 Figure. ¶ The effect of hazardous wastes on the local power structure of rural Sumter County, Ala, is examined, drawing on a review of newspaper coverage & using semistructured interview data from 15 community leaders & 13 members of the knowledgeable public. It was expected that the hazardous waste issue, & the Chem Waste facility in particular, would play a major role in the shaping of community power relations since the landfill's opening in 1977. Although a major shift has taken place in the structure of power within the county, the hazardous waste issue was incidental to that shift. It is argued that the simplist explanation to this lack of attention is the facility's economic benefits, ie, the employment of a large workforce & substantial revenue contributions to county & municipal governments. Other related factors contributing to this phenomenon are also discussed. 3 Tables, 37 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ In a quasi-experimental design, questionnaire data from 174 adults in Pa are used to assess factors relating to risk perceptions of hazardous waste sites. Measures of attitudes & beliefs about hazardous waste & waste sites, opinions about a detailed hypothetical "Superfund" scenario, including a complex cleanup plan, & indices of health risk estimates, trust, knowledge, & other pertinent beliefs are obtained. Levels of concern, both pre- & postcleanup, are the dependent variables, with independent variables including risk management options, health risk estimates, trust, & five sociodemographic characteristics. Results indicate that concern is a clear function of health risk estimates. Toxic chemicals from waste sites are viewed as a major cause of multiple health problems, especially cancers. Accurate health risk estimates moderate fears & are linked to levels of education. Education, however, does not explain concern. Trust is a major factor explaining concern & health risk estimates. The implications of these findings for risk communication are discussed. 5 Tables, 2 Figures, 45 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Drawing on a review of the prevailing social science paradigm of environmental accidents, an assessment of the economic impacts of the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill on the communities of south-central Alaska is presented. Described are: the responses of the affected Alaskan communities, the time-series forecasting models, & the data employed in the autoregressive integrated moving average modeling methodology. Findings indicate that the oil spill generated a regional economic boom for the small, natural resource-dependent communities located in the impacted region. An emergency response effort of unprecedented proportions infused tremendous amounts of capital into the fragile local economy of this area. While the advantages of this economic windfall were not evenly distributed across south-central Alaska, it is concluded that the environmental accident was economically beneficial & compensated for a sharp reduction in the profitability of commercial fishing. 5 Tables, 3 Figures, 56 References. Findings reveal that people perceive the risks associated with a repository to be serious, the likelihood of accidents to be high, & the risks to be threatening to the quality of life of those living nearby. Risks to future generations & from transportation accidents are the most important factors impacting perceptions. An examination of factors leading to the Exxon Valdez oil spill in Alaska: actions of the tanker crew, policies of the Exxon Corp hierarchy, & actions of governmental institutions. Over time, governmental agencies have come to realize a profit motive in promoting oil extraction, which is closely allied to motives of the firms that the agencies are supposed to regulate. Moreover, military interests have a vested interest in domestic petroleum-extraction activities, which has increased the attractiveness of Alaskan oil reserves. Thus, as C. N. Stone's model ("Systemic Power in Community Decision Making: Restatement of Stratification Theory," American Political Science Review, 1980, 74, 978-990) would predict, prodevelopment interests that encountered vocal opposition when the pipeline issue was publicly salient have been increasingly able to control the situation. As a result, the initial policies designed to safeguard the pubic interest have not been diligently enforced, intensifying the likelihood that such an accident would occur. 1 Figure, 65 References. ¶ In an exploration of the conflicts & confusion that clouded the organizational response to the Exxon Valdez oil spill in Alaska, actual organizational impacts of postspill initiatives are compared with hypothesized organizational structures specified in several federal crisis management plans. While those responding to the spill needed to contend with three conflicting issues–anticipating the phenomenon of emergent organization; cooperating with numerous parties who had various stakes in the outcome; & creating a high-performance, decision-oriented organization–those who had planned for contingencies had focused almost exclusively on issues of organizational control. Research results related to crisis management, organizational design, & organizational decision-making perspectives suggest several key ways in which plans for organization power might be improved. 3 Figures, 39 References. The evaluation was undertaken to inform the permitting authority's decision about whether the public interest would be best served by permitting the incinerator's operation, & to test the claims of agricultural producers near the incinerator's proposed site that the market for their products would be adversely affected by perceptions of risk among their retail consumers. Focus group interview data from retail consumers (N = 25), along with previous interview data for growers, distributors, & retailers (Ns not specified), reveal that the growers' predictions of adverse market effects are contrary to consumers' reports of their own past & likely future grocery shopping patterns. Mail survey data from samples of households in 3 communities at risk in the Parkfield (Calif) earthquake prediction experiment are used to estimate a model of public perception & response to communication about natural hazards risk. Estimated model parameters revealed consistent conclusions. Communicated risk information that was reinforced through additional communications &/or social cues precipitated an interactive personal search for more information; personal definitions of risk & what to do emerged, & these social constructions directed how the public responded. Perceived risk only indirectly impacted public action through information searching. It is thus suggested that searching behavior should intervene between perception of risk & response in the theory of public risk communication. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 47 References. An analysis of the impacts of flooding on property values in Paeroa, Te Aroha, & Thames, New Zealand indicates different experiences in the three communities, but suggests several common trends. Each community has distinct housing submarkets that exhibit different value characteristics, independent of hazardousness, which may either mask or exaggerate flood-related impacts. In addition, initial local impacts of events vary, but eventually differences in flooded & nonflooded properties decrease. Thus, at least over the long term, hazardousness is not a factor in housing value differentials. 12 Tables, 1 Figure, 18 References. Adapted from the source document. Perrow, Charles, Unfälle und Katastrophen–ihre Systembedingungen (Accidents and Catastrophes–Their System Conditions), Journal fur Sozialforschung, 1992, 32, 1, 61-75. (GER)

Environmental catastrophes, eg, those occurring at Chernobyl (USSR) & Bhopal (India), show the destructive capabilities of so-called high technology systems. Powerful elites can endanger millions of people by taking questionable risks. Attention is focused on those features of technological systems responsible for assessing the vulnerability to accidents & disasters. Complex interaction & tight coupling are introduced as two key features of a system prototype that, despite the most elaborate security measures, will invariably lead to an accident. Elevated destructive potentials in a particular workplace lead to perceptions that large-scale catastrophes are nothing more than normal occupational hazards. Special attention is given to attitudes often encountered in the chemical, nuclear energy, & atomic weapons industries. Adapted from the source document. ¶ To study the impact of the technological disaster precipitated by the Exxon Valdez oil spill on members of natural resource communities, an ecological-symbolic theoretical approach is employed that identifies natural resource communities as particularly vulnerable to ecological disasters. Longitudinal survey data on the social disruptions (personal, family, work, & community settings) & psychological stress (intrusive stress & community settings) & psychological stress (intrusive stress & avoidance behavior) experienced by 118 residents of a small fishing community in Prince William Sound, Alaska, are compared with similar data from a control population (N = 73). Particularly striking, the significantly higher levels of disruptions & stress identified among residents of the impact community in the initial phase of data collection (5 months after the spill) were still apparent in the final phase (18 months after), indicating that cultural values unique to members of a natural resource community may influence longitudinal patterns of social disruption & psychological stress. 5 Tables, 2 Figures, 71 References. ¶ A case study of a 1982 train derailment & toxic spill in Livingston, La, focuses on legal activities, including a comprehensive court-ordered scientific damage assessment for class-action litigation against the railroad. An independent assessment of the ecological, physical, economic, sociological, & psychological damages resulting from the derailment & subsequent events was undertaken Dec 1983-Feb 1985 by general & quality assurance audits of the records of the railroad's cleanup contractor, & by review of the records of the La health & environmental agencies. Personal interviews (N = 100 households) were used to assess the economic, sociological, & psychological damage. Findings indicate that the physical damage was relatively small, leaving no long-term negative environmental effects. However, property damage close to the derailment site was severe. Residents were found to have suffered psychological damage, as well as damage from community disruption. The sociological impact of the derailment was manifested in a desire to leave the area. Despite the apparent safety of the site in 1984, the residents' concerns remained high. The final settlement agreement was informed by the interdisciplinary scientific damage assessment. 29 References. Adapted from the source document. Results showed that: at 1 month, the symptoms most cited by the nurses were obsessive/compulsive behavior & depression; at 4 months, obsessive/compulsive behavior still predominated; at 1 year, a marked recurrence of intrusive thoughts & avoidant

¶ In Designing Women (DW), a TV situation comedy that chronicles a female-owned & -operated Atlanta (Ga) interior design firm, a Victorian house, functionally reconstituted as studio & store, signifies a variety of contemporary US cultural issues–the interrelated meanings of work, gender, & the South–that frame the series' narrative discourse, aesthetic text, & ideological framework. It is argued that DW exploits shared but stereotyped signs & symbols–the house as a model of domesticity & the city as a signifier of regionalism–that allow Americans to communicate architectonically. Constructs of sense of place & meaning of place are blurred, fostering an assimilation of Southern heritage into a larger North American culture. DW's architectural imagery serves hegemonic ends, suggesting that TV's imagistic use of the built environment mirro a consensus narrative of traditional senses of place & space in the U. 27 References. ¶ Despite conventional beliefs that famine is a natural disaster, considered here are conditions of famine creation in conflict situations. Following an examination of six case studies of contemporary African famines it is suggested that the use of food as a weapon of war by omission, commission, & provision has contributed to the creation of famine in recent decades. Despite the post-Cold war optimism for peace, conflict seems to be sustained by internal factors, including economic & environmental decline, political instability, & ethnic rivalry. Within these conflicts, the strategic importance of food is likely to remain central. The need to link concerns with food security & public health to those of development, human rights, & international relations is emphasized. 72 References. Adapted from the source document.

Baston, Michael (U Bristol, BS8 1TH England), The Culture of Poverty, Social Studies Review, 1990, 5, 3, Jan, 112-114.
¶ Oscar Lewis listed 62 characteristics of the culture of poverty (La Vida: A Puerto Rican Family in the Culture of Poverty, San Juan & New York: Secker & Warburg, 1965) but failed to establish cause & effect, or to provide a test to decide which of the people living in poverty were living in a culture of poverty. His claims attracted attention because they pointed to the insufficiency of structural explanations on their own. A group with internal vitality may suffer poverty but not be impoverished. If people in poverty invest a windfall in a way that enables them to escape poverty, a benign circle is operating; if they spend it on luxuries, there is a vicious circle. In GB, Lewis's ideas were taken up on the political Right & attracted politically motivated criticism of a lower intellectual quality than in the US. British research into transmitted deprivation shows that there are several vicious circles, suggesting thatwhen there is pressure to continue using an unsatisfactory concept, the best solution is often to replace it with a battery of more detailed concepts. 8 References. ¶ Poverty in Flanders & other modern welfare states exists as a special type of relationship between the individual & the government. More attention should be given to the criteria set for programs created to eliminate poverty. Currently, the emphasis is on welfare entitlements, as a right to enjoy opportunities for social integration. Alternatively, entitlement can be seen as an intrinsic right to a decent existence. ¶ The accelerated growth of home ownership in GB in the 1980s coincided with growing economic & social uncertainty, resulting in a rise in mortgage default, a problem discussed here via a critique of the official statistics. Two central questions–how households respond to mortgage default, & strategies developed & their relationships to the gender divisions around resource allocation & patterns of financial control & management within households–are discussed in the context of the existing literature on household financial management in which, typically, men control resources but women manage them. Data are drawn from a qualitative interview study of 40 households in the early stages of mortgage arrears. In 2 households, findings indicate that, whereas initially, the mortgage is both controlled & managed by the male partner, as the debts mount, the burden of responsibility for management of default is increasingly passed to the woman. Debt, & particularly the potential loss of the home, provides the means to legitimate changes in household management patterns. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 12 References. ¶ Probably no other aspect of the South African conflict has elicited more divergent explanations & misinterpretations than the ongoing political violence. It is variously attributed to (1) F. W. de Klerk's double agenda & unreformed police; (2) a "third force" of right-wing elements in the security establishment, bent on derailing the government's negotiation agenda; (3) Inkatha-ANC (African National Congress) rivalry, engineered by ambitious Gatsha Buthelezi in danger of being sidelined as an equal third party; (4) the ANC's campaign of armed struggle, ungovernability, & revolutionary intolerance; (5) ingrained tribalism, unleashed by the lessening of white repression that merely resulted in black-on-black violence formerly held in check; & (6) the legacy of apartheid in general, migrancy, hostel conditions, & high unemployment among a "lost youth" generation. Single-cause explanations are inadequate; all play a role. Further, regardless of peace accords signed at the top, antagonistic groups at the bottom often act violently outside of leadership control. Comment, 122-126.
¶ Given that interpersonal violence is endemic & that most cases still are not officially reported, alternative means of determining prevalence & incidence are necessary. While it is appropriate to critique the research methodology used in examining such behavior, the criticism of figures may be driven, in certain cases, by motivation other than dispassionate scientific debate, at a time when society is redefining what is acceptable between men & women & adults & children. This endeavor to redefine relationships is compromised when research results are misstated or distorted. In Defending Date Rape, Mary P. Koss (U of Arizona, Tucson) argues that efforts to discredit her research findings regarding date rape ("The Scope of Rape: Incidence and Prevalence of Sexual Aggression and Victimization in a National Sample of Higher Education Students," Journal of Consulting & Clinical Psychology, 1987, 55, 162-170) are part of an agenda to reduce public support for the appropriations directed at rape crisis services & education/prevention. The critics' assertion that the study's scope of victimization is so large because it is based on a new definition of rape ignores that the study employed the definition of rape consistent with the statutes of most North American jurisdictions. Their assertion that the large discrepancy between the estimated rape incidence for college students & estimates by a federally funded survey fails to consider the serious criticism that the federal survey approach has received in the professional literature. Furthermore, the critics deliberately twisted the presentation of data related to the victims' conceptualization of their experiences. S. ¶ The fallacies of the aggression-reducing strategies of control, catharsis, & cohabitation are examined. Aggression reduction through control or punishment may temporarily suppress aggressive behavior, but it has numerous side effects & fails to teach appropriate behavior. Aggression reduction through catharsis is a myth & has no legitimate basis in research. Cohabitation theory views aggression as an inevitable characteristic of human nature & offers little solution other than adaptation to its presence. Single-cause theories of aggression reduction overlook aggression's complexity. Aggression has multiple causes ranging from physiological predisposition to the presence of potential victims, & can best be reduced by a complex array of intervention modes introduced in an individualized manner. Comment, 13.

\ discussion of the exile experience of the Stockholm (Sweden)-based rkish writer Demir Özlü. In Özlü's writing, Western Europe is identi- d as a codified urban civilization. Four capitals constitute lü's affective geography: Paris (France), Berlin (Germany), Amster- n (Netherlands), & Stockholm; impressions from these cities serve to onstruct his memories from Istanbul (Turkey). Yet, the writings also eal the exile's disenchantment with the morbid realities of European es, eg, violence & alienation. In Nedim Gürsel, errance et nostalgie edim Gursel, Wandering and Nostalgia), Timour Muhidine provides ief portrait of Paris-based, Turkish-born Gursel. He observes that the us of Gürsel's writing is the universal personality of the exile. sel's work expresses painful rootlessness & feminized nostalgia of key. I. Shagrir Medical records & demographic information on a sample of 53 women 55+ & 53 ages 18-43, drawn from a nonhospital-based clinic that es as the primary resource for rape victims in Shelby County, Tenn, used to evaluate variables affected solely by patient's age. The racial position was similar for both groups, & there was no difference in the interval to examination. Among the elderly, the majority of assaults 7%) took place at the victim's home, & most were by an unknown ilant. Genital injuries were more prevalent among the elderly vic- . Intimidation by physical force was all that was necessary to subdue victim in most cases, & the assailants' racial distribution was similar oth groups. 7 References. ¶ Self-report survey questionnaires returned by 663 nurses at 5 local hos- pitals reveal that 243 (37%) respondents had faced violence. Nurses at hospitals with low response rates to the questionnaire reported less as- sault, yet the violence admitted to was described as more deadly (eg, rape, use of knives or guns). More nurses at public than private hospitals had obtained some training to handle potentially violent situations. Seri- ous assault was negatively related to amount of training. At the public psychiatric hospital, violent acts were most frequent, but the rate of deadly violence was lowest. The need to train staff at general as well as psychiatric hospitals is discussed. 2 Tables, 10 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Based on 136 consecutive cases of convicted child molesters in Pima County, Ariz, during 1984/85 for which case history, psychological in- ventory, presentence report, & police report data were available, the fix- ated-regressive typology used in the child sexual literature is shown to be empirically invalid. Application of the criteria that differentiate fixed status from regressive status among child molesters yields a unimodal & continuous distribution, rather than the predicted bimodal distribution. Multiple regression analyses indicate that an offender's degree of regres- sion is significantly predicted by his/her relation to the victim & post non-sex-related criminal record. Alternatives to the fixed-regression ty- pology are discussed, & implications for understanding child molesters are elucidated. 5 Tables, 34 References. Adapted from the source docu- ment.

A growing body of social scientific work attempts to document & interpret various aspects of the communal violence that erupted in South Asia during the 1980s. Significant analytical issues raised in this literature include the place of violence in classical theory, the disciplined "crowd" as an object of theoretical attention, & the survivors' perspective in the analysis of ethnic violence. Empirical & theoretical insight on the 1984 riots in Delhi, India, from Veena Das's recently edited collection Mirrors of Violence: Communities, Riots, and Survivors in South Asia, Delhi: Oxford U Press, 1990) & the considerable corpus of work on Sri Lanka's 1983 anti-Tamil riots serve as the basis for exploring relationships between: violence & reason; crowds & perception; violence, the state, & normal politics; & survivors & language. Two pressing but unresolved issues remain: the place of anthropology & sociology in the understanding of collective identity & collective violence in South Asia, & the search for the bases of an alternative politics. 38 References. ¶ Police reports & court testimony from 274 women who either avoided rape or were raped by subsequently incarcerated men are used to examine women's resistance strategies. Findings indicate that resistance strategies have different effects on sexual abuse & physical injury outcomes for physical & verbal attacks. In response to physical attacks, the most effective resistance strategies were forceful fighting & screaming for reducing the severity of sexual abuse without increasing the level of physical injury. In response to verbal attacks, screaming or fleeing/pushing the offender away were more effective than was nonresistance for reducing the severity of sexual abuse without increasing the level of physical injury. Results concur with previous research findings that immediate, forceful resistance strategies, in contrast to nonresistance, are effective in avoiding rape. Neither fleeing/pushing the offender away nor pleading, begging, or reasoning were found effective in response to physical attacks. 1 Table. Adapted from the source document. ¶ A theoretical tradition (the "stream analogy") predating Emile Durkheim links suicide & homicide as two currents in a single stream called the lethal violence rate (LVR). Data from a sample of 31 nations on homicide & suicide rates 1950-1970 are used to examine inequality & economic development as determinants of the LVR & its direction, suicide murder ratio (SMR), as well as of separate suicide & homicide rates. Inequality is in general a better predictor than is economic development. Controlling for development, inequality is curvilinearly related to homicide & the LVR, & has negative linear effects on suicide & the SMR. Controlling for inequality, development is unrelated to the LVR, curvilinearly related to the SMR, & weakly related to suicide & homicide. 3 Tables, 72 References. ¶ In an exploration of the potential relationship between presentations of media violence & subsequent violent behavior by viewers, links between the timing & outcomes of the Washington Redskins' football games & the frequency of admissions to hospital emergency rooms in northern Va are examined. After controlling for days of the week, months, years, & special holidays, results indicate that the frequency of admissions of women victims of gunshots, stabbings, assaults, falls, lacerations & being struck by objects increases when the team wins. It is hypothesized that many of these injuries are the results of battering & that having a favorite team win may act as a trigger for assault in some males. Bauman explains why traditional sociology & lay opinion still subscribe to the view that a rationally conceived socialization will result in a progressive, nonviolent, nonracist form of society. He argues that the WWII genocide of the European Jews was due in part to the intermingling of religious anti-Semitism & the "civilized" conditions of modernity. Bauman looks at reasons for the "success" of Nazi genocide programs. Brein fers a compelling critique of American Jewry & its urgent plea to o those forces of Americanization & Zionization that bring out the f potential of American Jews & Israelis. (GER)

¶ A review essay on books by: Drucilla Cornell, The Doubly-Priced World: Myth, Allegory and the Feminine (1990); Catharine A. MacKinnon, Toward a Feminist Theory of the State (Cambridge, 1989); Frances E. Olsen, The Family and the Market: A Study of Ideology and Legal Reform (1983); & Carol Smart, Feminism and the Power of Law (London, 1989 [see listings in IRPS No. 68]). The reception in Germany of feminist legal scholarship from the US leaves German sociologists somewhat at a loss due to lack of a corresponding movement in Germany, where there is no fundamental theory grouping structural, symbolic, ideological, & factual effects of the law on women with respect to the state, gender hierarchy, & the legal system. In this light, four recent works by leading UK & US authors are discussed. Cornell, in commenting on the corpus of feminist research published to date, laments that so much scholarly energy has been devoted to documenting the already obvious fact that women suffer various forms of oppression; rather than continuing in this vein, she encourages her colleagues to work toward a realistic assessment of where women stand today, including their disagreements with other women, & then to proceed toward identifying goals based on the reality of women's lives today. MacKinnon focuses on the intrinsic inequality of having men define for women what the feminine gender role & sexuality should be; however, she does not proceed to construct any vision of how feminity would be defined if this were not the case Smart seeks to change patriarchal structure more through the administration of legal privileges & through changes in civil law rather than through a thorough overhauling of the entire legal system; however, she does not provide a feminist analysis of the concept of the state or of law Olsen's approach centers on the dichotomy between the private & public spheres, maintaining that the ideological division between the family & the market reflects divisions between the state & society & between male & female. However, consideration of women's private & public lives in the former East Germany would call some of her conclusions into doubt. M. Meeks

Fred Alford's Melanie Klein and Critical Social Theory (New Haven, Conn: Yale U Press, 1989) It is argued that Alford's "Kleinian" critique of Dinnerstein's claim that male domination, political domination, & the domination of nature are rooted in the maternal monopoly of early child care is undermined by his inadequate critique of Klein, which unintentionally shows that there are no viable Kleinian reasons for rejecting Dinnerstein's hypothesis. It is concluded that there are in fact good Kleinian reasons for suggesting co-parenting as a solution to the problem of patriarchy. W. Howard

¶ It is contended that to move beyond the dominant theoretical imaginary of white male academics, women need to find a way of articulating their difference & differences without recourse to binary opposites, & to rethink human agency. It is shown that US & French feminists have already begun to articulate a theoretical imaginary anchored in women's experience. The emergence of this feminist imaginary is explored via readings of several texts, including works by Luce Irigaray (eg, see Ethique de la différence sexuelle (Ethics of Sexual Difference), Paris: Minuit, 1984). The logic & possibilities of a feminist imaginary are explored, & expected criticisms of a feminist theoretical imaginary by hostile Marxist, poststructuralist, & deconstructionist critics are addressed. Banton, Michael (U Bristol, BS8 1TH England), Comparing Inequalities of Race and Sex, Social Studies Review, 1990, 5, 4, Mar, 157-161.

¶ The role of supply & demand in explaining inequalities of race & sex is considered. It is contended that the services of women or people from ethnic minorities might be perceived to be less valuable to an employer because of perceived or actual lack of physical stamina, work experience, career motivation, or the investment of parents in their childhood education. On the other hand, employers may discriminate on the basis of personal taste, profit motives, or lack of information to calculate the degree of risk. It is concluded that supply & demand can give rise to inequalities of race & sex in employment, which can then translate into inequalities in other spheres of society, eg, housing & education. 4 References. ¶ The history of the sexuality debates among feminists is explored, arguing that in both nineteenth-century & contemporary sexuality debates, the personal is understood as the foundation for a political stance, while the debates concomitantly transform feminist understandings of the extent to which the personal is, in fact, political. A feminist standpoint that remains silent about personal life & that fails to critically examine sexuality & practices that legitimize certain sexual relations & sexual institutions is a feminism that cannot arrive at a critical awareness of a woman's sociocultural context. This transformation of feminist understandings thus serves to undermine the epistemological assumptions of the debates, resulting in a feminism that cannot be radical. 20 References. ¶ A review article on a book by Nancy Fraser, Unruly Practices: Power, Discourse and Gender in Contemporary Social Theory (Polity Press/Minnesota U Press, 1989 [see listing in IRPS No. 68]). Informing Fraser's collection of essays is a concern for the relationship between epistemology & politics. The book provides incisive critiques of recent developments in critical social theory & postmodernism. Fraser discusses the work of Jürgen Habermas, Richard Rorty, the French Derrideans, & Michel Foucault, who is criticized for developing a value-neutral account of modern power that fails when he adopts the language of domination & subjugation to describe the modern power/knowledge regime. Focusing on liberalism, Fraser offers a broad analysis of modernity & its connection with humanism, & attempts to posit a critical social theory that recognizes multiple discursive forms in a contested social arena. By privileging the discursive in her theory of the politics of need, it is argued that Fraser falls into the postmodernist trap of constructing linguistic puzzles in which real lives & their needs are often elided. McCall, Leslie (Dept Sociology U Wisconsin, Madison 53706), Does Gender Fit? Bourdieu, Feminism, and Conceptions of Social Order, Theory and Society, 1992, 21, 6, Dec, 837-867.

¶ Feminists in most fields other than anthropology have found Pierre Bourdieu's work to be unhelpful at best on the topic of gender relations & some see it as methodologically & theoretically sexist. In a feminist analysis of Bourdieu's conceptual innovations, empirical claims, & epistemological stances related to his work on modern capitalist societies, a three-level typology of gender relations developed by feminist theorists is compared to a three-level conceptual apparatus developed by Bourdieu. More specifically, gender symbolism, gendered social institutions & organizations, & gender identity can be illuminated by the relationship between social order, forms of capital, & habitus in Bourdieu's lexicon. A more nuanced understanding of gendered dispositions & cultural capital help inform the relationships between structure & interaction for both followers of Bourdieu & feminist scholars. This conceptual framework also explores the relationship between class & gender as mediated through cultural capital in occupational structures. Finally, feminist methodological & epistemological debates are addressed as symptomatic of struggles over capital in the academic field, thus displacing the relevance of philosophical claims in favor of a sociological analysis. ¶ In the early Israeli kibbutzim, communal living was a necessity, & antifamilistic values were encouraged, using mechanisms like the common stove, the disparagement of weddings, the rejection of symbols of family ties, & the acquisition of parental rights by the kibbutz. In the 1990s, kibbutzim are mainly family-centered, with children sleeping with their parents. The sudden growth of kibbutzim, improvement in health & welfare, & the need for offspring contributed to this shift. Women are now concentrated in education & social work, in a gender-typed division of labor. Women also have shorter working hours, a morning break for visiting children, & special educational duties that deter them from holding more male-dominated jobs. Theories relating to the process of familism (strengthening the family, motherhood, & the mother's role) in the kibbutz are discussed, including sociobiological approaches, the socialization of women in the kibbutz, the "regression" of women to their central place in the household, & the lack of any real change in role division. These theories are not sufficient to explain the process of familism; the diminishing adherence to egalitarian values in the kibbutz & changes in the structure of the larger Israeli society must also be considered. 23 References. ¶ Postmodern legal theory & empirical methods are combined in a study of the legal status of Scandinavian females (Fs) who have commitments to both work & family, based on interviews (N not specified) with employees in F-dominated workplaces in the public sector. The data reveal how Fs deal with & reconcile the competing demands of paid work in the workplace & unpaid work outside it. Also examined are: the generation of norms within F-dominated workplaces, the feminist understanding of law in postmodern society, & the status of women's law & informal law. It is argued that a broader concept of law is needed to address the problems that have arisen as a consequence of Fs' increased interaction with the legal system. 48 References. W. Because the legal category of "mother" operates to "domesticate" lesbians, it threatens to interfere with lesbian survival in lesbian terms because it quells the ability of lesbians to even think beyond the legal category. Following an analysis of the ways in which "mother" has been employed by both lesbians & nonlesbians within the legal system, it is argued that, to retain the power of self-definition, lesbians must seek to overcome a legal paradigm that sanctifies this restrictive legal category of "mother," if only to expand the category to include "lesbian mother." 0 References. In an introduction to this journal issue (see related abstracts in SA 41:3) focusing on history & feminist theory, it is suggested that, by presenting models of feminist historical work that exemplify a range of practices & perspectives, the contributions offer some elements of a theoretically informed feminist historical consciousness. The essays particularly explore the relation between feminist theory & the history of women & identify some of the theoretical & substantive issues that continue to provoke heated debate. It is contended that while feminist theory is important for history, history must reciprocally inform feminist theory. The articles demonstrate that feminist historians have succeeded in writing historical narratives that expose the reductionism of the public/private dichotomy, reaching toward a more integrated historical narrative. ¶ Given the number & longevity of problems that female (F) social work educators have faced in the areas of salaries, academic rank & tenure, publication rates, & level of decision making, one might have expected positive resolutions by this time. ¶ Based on a desire to understand how categories of racial, ethnic, & cultural difference, particularly between women, have been constructed in the past, the reproduction of these categories in more recent political & ideological conflicts is explored. The analysis considers the ways that feminist historiography has dealt with questions of difference, ie, the role of "women's history" in providing feminism with sufficient theoretical or historical evidence to understand ideas about racial & cultural difference. It is contended that a feminist theory of history must inquire into the construction & reproduction of racialized femininities. Ideas about white womanhood produced at particular points in the past illustrate a range of questions that emerge from a perspective of race, class, & gender. The analysis also shows how a historically informed & "antiracist" feminism might intervene differently in contemporary political debates by dissecting various constructions of white femininity in two narratives of cultural conflict. ¶ Critiquing the economic analysis of law from a feminist perspective, it is argued that the small points of convergence are greatly outweighed by the substantial divergences. Because gender is central to the way social life is organized, & because women have continuously been oppressed throughout history, the economist's reliance on the market as a model of human relations, particularly gender relations, is problematic. As thoughtful reconsideration of marriage, prostitution, & surrogacy contracts clearly demonstrates, the ideological division between family & market is increasingly suspect, which begins to suggest the limitations of markets & market methodology. ¶ The association between religious attitudes/practices of African-American women & support for gender equality & abortion is investigated, using 1988 telephone survey data from 371 African-American residents of Washington, DC. Multivariate analysis indicates that religious involvement & orthodoxy are strong predictors of opposition to legal abortion, but are not associated with opposition to gender equality. Indeed, some religious variables strongly associated with antifeminism among whites are associated with increased support for organized feminism among African Americans. It is suggested that messages of racial equality & collective action heard in African-American churches spill over to the realm of gender politics & explain religious women's support for organizations that promote gender equity. 3 Tables, 1 Appendix, 32 References. ¶ Topic transitions are examined in 12 medical encounters in private practice settings between male (M) & female (F) physicians ([MDs] N = 4 each) & F patients (N = 8). Transitions can be collaborative (reciprocal activities) or unilateral (sudden topic change). The problem of defining topic in discourse analysis is reviewed. Several stages of analysis revealed 4 major categories of transition: reciprocal activities, links (within-turn topic change), minimal links (affirmative words (eg, "OK"), & sudden topic changes. The ratio of reciprocal to unilateral activities differed with MD gender. For F MDs, the ratio was 5:1; for Ms, 1.4:1. The ratio of reciprocal to unilateral topic transitions for patients was 13.5:1. For MDs it was 2.5:1. The more dominant role of MD, especially M MD, is consistent with cultural expectations. ¶ The relationship between commercially produced images of violence against women & real world violence is explored. The major themes found in pornography are highlighted & compared with themes found in mainstream media, eg, advertisements, MTV, & "slasher movies." Using concepts developed within semiotics & visual sociology, these images are decoded in terms of the cultural messages they disseminate regarding the position of women in society & the ways that they legitimize violence against women. It is argued that past research that has attempted to examine this link has tended to concentrate on single exposure, short-term effects, & has thus ignored the long-term & more far-reaching effects that such images may have on consumers. Given that research within the field of communication studies has established that commercially produced images of women now dominate the visual landscape, it is important to go beyond the traditional paradigms & instead redirect scholarly attention toward the larger question of how media images contribute to the social construction of reality. By drawing on theories & research recently developed within sociology & cultural studies, a more macro analysis of media effects is attempted that seeks to understand the role that media images of women play in producing & reproducing gender inequality. 15 References. ¶ The affective & behavioral component of paternity as socially defined is explored, drawing from discussions at meetings of men's groups in Quebec. The scenario of the noncustodial father abandoning his parenting responsibilities after a divorce does not apply to every case. The range of postdivorce/-separation reactions fits into a larger perspective on male emotional self-awareness. The social rehabilitation thus contributes to a growth in the awareness of fatherhood. A destabilization of the provider role is met with an emotional rather than an authoritarian reinforcement of a link with the child. Defining their paternity roles in terms of equality, fathers long for an autonomous parental role as a means of guaranteeing a continual relationship, both biological & emotional, with their child. 28 References. An exploration of the impact of developing medical technologies on the mergence of transsexualism in the twentieth century. The prevalent point of view that transsexualism is a psychological disorder of gender identity is challenged, arguing that it must be studied as an effect of progress in medical technologies that make sex change possible, ie, to reorient debates concerning the formation of subjectivity as a "gender" (as a concept) is itself an effect of such technologies. The primary literature on transsexualism of the early 1950s is reviewed, as well as the development of the concepts of gender, gender role, & gender identity concerning the treatment of intersexual subjects. An overview is presented of endocrinology & plastic surgery as medical technologies essential to the emergence of transsexualism, demonstrating how they contributed to the production of a context in which transsexual subjectivity could be conceptualized & sex change materially enacted. It is concluded that transsexuals attempt to become the representative subjects of gender. Being such, however, means consistent technological regulation of the body's signification of physiological sex. The narratives of gender that support transsexual treatments work to contain the meanings of transsexuals' demands for surgical & hormonal treatments to change sex within the discourses of humanism concerning the social & natural distinctions between the sexes. ¶ A plea is made for a constructionist approach to sex research that would open the field to sociologists & historians instead of leaving it in the domain of biologists & doctors. Such an approach is illustrated by a clarification of the concepts of homosexuality & gender differences, showing how society strives to maintain two distinct genders that are frail & labile. Through analysis of 47 peer reviews of academic papers written by graduate students, an attempt is made to determine whether gender influences complimenting behavior when males & females ([Ms & Fs] N = 18 & 29, respectively) participate in the same activity. The use of compliments as politeness strategies & signals of interpersonal involvement are reviewed. Analysis of variance revealed that the Fs used significantly more compliment intensifiers than did Ms, more often structuring their discourse by framing it with opening & closing compliments. Consistent patterns suggest that F writers accommodate to the gender of their addressee, resulting in a distinct F-to-F complimenting style. It is concluded that, even in a situation where Ms & Fs participate on an equal basis, gender influences the use of compliments in being polite & creating a sense of involvement. Obituaries concerning deceased male (M) & female (F) managers (N 477 & 20, respectively) that were published in 4 daily newspapers in the years 1974, 1980 & 1986 were content analyzed for evidence of social stereotypes. Terms used to describe the managers were classified into 53 categories & included in a correspondence analysis. The results show that images of M managers did not change from 1974 to 1986: M managers were perceived as intelligent, knowledgeable, experienced, outstanding opinion leaders. Images of F managers, on the other hand, changed dramatically; in the 1970s, Fs were described as adorable & tractable; but in the 1980s, they came to be viewed as contentious, though still lacking in knowledge & expertise. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 33 References. Questionnaires composed of several standardized scales were administered to university students (total N = 196) in southern Italy & the Federal Republic of Germany to test the hypothesis that generalized self-related cognitions concerning sex-role (SR) orientations & locus-of-control (LOC) beliefs are more strongly associated with cultural membership than with morphophenotype sex. It was also expected that differences in generalized LOC orientations between the morphophenotype sexes can be duplicated by psychological SR orientation variables. Both hypotheses were confirmed. Findings also show that national & cultural differences exceed markedly morphophenotype sex differences in LOC SR. Results are discussed with reference to an action-theoretical approach to human development, which focuses on the efforts of individuals to regulate & to control their own development within a given cultural context. 2 Tables, 30 References. ¶ An experimental investigation of gender influences on reactions to violations of expected conversational behavior. Audio recordings of 2-person interactions (N = 151 Caucasian undergraduates) that varied in gender composition but were identical in script features were rated by judges on several scales, including the degree to which participants were seen to be argumentative, rude, & assertive. Results showed that interrupter sex did not affect ratings, even though interrupters were evaluated differently than those they interrupted. However, gender composition significantly affected 2 of 3 derived factors–disrespect & assertiveness–such that when a woman interrupted a man, the pair was rated significantly more disrespectful & assertive than either of the two same-sex pairs. It is concluded that conversational interruptions occurring among mixed-sex pairs are often interpreted not merely as individual infractions, but as assaults on established power relations. 5 Tables, 34 References. ¶ Value preferences & sex role were evaluated in 210 male & 218 female Chinese adolescents in Hong Kong, using the Rokeach Value Survey & the Bem Sex-Role Inventory. Of 18 terminal values, the 4 most important were freedom, true friendship, happiness, & a comfortable life; the 4 least important were mature love, national security, an exciting life, & salvation. Of 8 instrumental values, the 4 most important were capable, cheerful, broad-minded, & intellectual; the 4 least important were logical, imaginative, clean, & obedient. Significant gender differences were found only on 5 terminal & 3 instrumental values. The choice of the most & least preferred terminal & instrumental values differed considerably across the 4 sex-role groups–masculine, feminine, androgynous, & undifferentiated. Masculine & feminine adolescents were similar in their terminal value systems, but differed considerably in instrumental value systems; androgynous adolescents were very similar to masculine ones in both systems. Masculinity & femininity were related more extensively to instrumental than terminal values, with masculinity having more pervasive effects than did femininity on value preferences, per regression analyses. Overall, Chinese students had personal & competency emphases in their value preferences, in contrast to stereotypes about a collective orientation for Chinese students. 3 Tables, 31 References. Attitudes supporting gender-based political inequality were reflected by agreeing with the statement "politics should be left to men." Aggregate decrease in antifeminist attitudes since 1975 is attributed to generational replacement & a generalized period effect. West Germany is considerably more antifeminist than other Western European countries surveyed, & has shown smaller increases in egalitarian attitude. Antifeminism is found to be best predicted by low levels of education & income, & Catholic countries are less egalitarian than Protestant countries. 5 Tables, 1 Figure. Data obtained during interviews revealed that sex-role attitudes were related to work satisfaction, but only for full-time housewives. Employment status had a significant influence on satisfaction with work & with overall life, but not with marriage & family life. Significant differences were found in marital satisfaction, work satisfaction, & well-being between working & nonworking women. The role of gender in Swedish social issues is explored, based on 1980s ıpirical research by Statistics Sweden. To promote full employment, blic funds for childcare & parenthood insurance are part of social poli-, aiming for an equitable distribution of benefits by gender; but in real-', only 8% of the beneficiaries are male. The educational differential r wage earners suggests that for a given income level, college-educated ımen are more often underemployed. In Sweden, women's participan in the workforce is greatest among industrialized nations, despite ɜir occupational segregation. Supported by psychoana-c case histories, it is suggested that women have a subconscious belief .n internal, pleasure-giving organ of femininity that may be lost. Female (F) & male (M) Ss responded to 3 sce-os in which they interacted with an imagined partner who had either e, less, or the same amount of power; partners were either the same or opposite sex. Overall, power differences had a more profound effect than did ler in predicting the choice of influence strategies. ¶ The case of the Ecole d'Yzeure, a state vocational school founded in 1887 for the training of female wards of the state, is used to explore the role of gender & gender identities both in representations of "the state" & the substance of social policy under the early Third Republic in France. State representatives drew on broad representations of the state & its relationship to the populace, which universalized male identities & suppressed feminine specificity, to conceive programs of assistance for abandoned or endangered children at the end of the nineteenth century. By the mid-twentieth century, the Ecole d'Yzeure disappeared from both the institutional infrastrucure & the historical memory of public assistance in France. It is argued that the failed experiment of the Ecole d'Yzeure & the unresolved narration of its fate in the twentieth century suggests that, for those charged with representing the state, either as administrators or as historians, the issue of training skilled female workers shut down the dominant frame of reference for understanding public assistance to children in general terms. Further, the Ecole d'Yzeure represented the breach of the Third Republic's historical sensibilities, interjecting "woman worker" into a paradigm that consistently grounded its images of the past & the future in universalized masculine terms. ¶ Historically, the promises of nationalist movements to ameliorate gender-based subordination have gone unfulfilled because patriarchal household structures have remained intact, but the South African case may prove different. A postapartheid South African government will be forced to contend with the demands of an urban movement, not a peasant-based, agrarian movement. The massive urbanization & industrialization that South Africa has undergone will not be resurrected in a postapartheid state. Three distinct processes bear witness to this claim: the gender-specific effects of migration labor that have undermined the peasant economy; the higher labor force participation among women in South Africa that has resulted in an unusual degree of female economic independence; & the involvement of women in community & labor organizations that has allowed for the articulation of gender-specific demands. 79 References. Women in Charge: Politeness and Directives in the Speech of Japanese Women, UM Language in Society, 1992, 21, 1, Mar, 59-82.

¶ Much research on language & gender has equated Japanese females' (Fs') speech with powerlessness, & characterized it as soft, polite, & indirect, presenting problems for Fs who must give orders. In a command situation, a F could adopt masculine speech patterns & thus violate social norms, or she could retain a feminine style & risk appearing to lack authority. Here, the verbal morphology used in directives issued by Fs in positions of authority is compared with the forms chosen by males in similar positions. Results indicate that Fs do choose more polite forms, though little evidence is found to support the claim that Fs in authority tend to defeminize their speech. Rather, it appears that such Fs create new strategies for communicating authority while maintaining traditional femininity. Specifically, the "motherese strategy," usually used to give orders within the family, is being extended to convey the power of Fs over their subordinates in nontraditional domains. These results seem more consistent with a model of language & gender based on difference than with one based on dominance. It is noted that, as the roles of Japanese Fs continue to change, cultural norms of linguistic style will also evolve. 5 Tables, 2 Figures, 43 References. Adapted from the source document.

Analysis of questionnaire data from 1,747 seventh & ninth graders supports the prediction for those living with both parents. Contrary to expectations, the larger female disadvantage among those with separated parents, regardless of age, is interpreted, ex post facto, in terms of separated mothers becoming stronger models for traditionally feminine roles as they become involved in heterosexual activities. In analyzing a subsample of 1,252, the same pattern is found in effects on change in science achievement over the preceding 2 years of Ss' lives. 3 Tables, 34 References. ¶ Analyses of public examination results in the UK, particularly on the GCSE (the national exam for all students ages 16+), have demonstrated significant gender differences in both entry patterns & outcomes, typically in the form of better results by girls in subjects other than mathematics & some sciences. It is argued that the type of assessment is only one factor, & that the different experiences & expecta tions of both pupils & teachers are also significant. ¶ The interactive influence of gender role typing & multiple role involve ment on specific mental health concerns of 160 middle-class Caucasia undergraduate females (Fs) is investigated. Consistent with previous re search, data culled from a battery of questionnaires, inventories, & scale reveal that depression & anxiety are a function of gender role typin (feminine-typed & undifferentiated Fs display greater depression & anx iety relative to masculine-typed or androgynous Fs), with no difference attributable to multiple role involvement. For substance abuse, howeve an interaction effect is evident: gender-typed (both masculine & femi nine) Fs striving to excel across multiple roles engaged in greater sub stance abuse than do the nongender typed (androgynous & undifferenti ated). A similar interaction previously has been reported with regard t disordered eating. It is concluded that the lack of gender typing for F may enable them to cope more effectively with the conflicting demand of multiple roles, thereby reducing certain health risk behaviors (eg, di ordered eating & substance abuse), though other mental health concern (eg, depression & anxiety) may not be similarly affected. 1 Table, 3 References. ". . . a thought-provoking book that offers the reader an opportunity to vicariously experience the narrators' feelings and relate to what they endured." William Matulich, Ph.D.

Theodore C. Kent, Ph.D.

BEHIND THE THERAPISTS' NOTES

FEARS, FEELINGS, & HOPES

In my practice of psychology, I usually take notes as I listen to my clients' problems. One day I asked myself, What fears, feelings and hopes might lie behind the clinical notes therapists take? In my mind I pictured myself as one of the people who seek help from various therapists. These thoughts led me to write this book.

-T.C. Kent

The narrators are composites of actual people who share their very personal fears, feelings and hopes with the reader. As the stories unfold intriguing twists and ironies are revealed that heightened the drama occurring in their troubled lives. The narrators' problems represent a cross-section of current sociopsychological mental health concerns. Comments at the end of each story makes the book even more instructive and thought-provoking.

Centaurs in the Twilight. W.B. Yeats's Use of the Classical Tradition. Amsterdam/Atlanta, GA 1992. 547 pp. (Costerus 88)

ISBN: 90-5183-435-7 Hfl. 200,-/US-$ 117.50

This book presents an investigation into the sources of the classical elements in the whole of William Butler Yeats's oeuvre. These sources include not only works from Greek and Latin literature and their translations, but also Yeats's reading of secondary studies about antiquity. Furthermore, this study also takes into account Yeats's use of, for example, Romantic poetry and the occult tradition in as far as they have served him as mediating sources for the classics.

With the aid of this material the author shows how Yeats often used the classics as essential parts of his own work. This study convincingly demonstrates how throughout his entire career the poet was a serious student of the classics, to a greater extent than most Yeats-scholars have recognized. Subjects discussed in this book are, among others, Yeats's life-long admiration for Homer, the classical background of his concept of the Daimon, and the importance of "The Statues" in Yeats's poetry. Based on original research and on a thorough study of a vast amount of books and articles on Yeats, this study presents a considerable number of challenging readings of Yeats's works which throw new light upon the oeuvre as a whole.

The Journal of Mind and Behavior

The Journal of Mind and Behavior (JMB) is dedicated to the interdisciplinary approach within psychology, psychiatry, medicine and related fields—building upon the assumption of a unified science. Mind and behavior interact and causally relate to each other in multidirectional ways, and JMB urges the exploration of these interrelationships. The editors are particularly interested in scholarly work in the following areas: the psychology, philosophy, and sociology of experimentation and the scientific method ☐ the relationship between methodology, operationism, and theory construction ☐ the mind-body problem in the social sciences ☐ historical, existential, teleological, and introspective reports relevant to psychology, psychosocial methodology, and social philosophy ☐ the philosophical impact of a mind/body epistemology upon psychology, psychiatry, and medicine.

JMB is based upon the premise that all meaningful statements about human behavior rest ultimately upon observation—with no one scientific method possessing a priori, greater credence than another. Emphasis upon experimental control should not preclude the experiment as a measure of behavior outside the scientific laboratory. The editors wish to rely upon the paradigm of empirical science as a fundamental basis of scientific knowledge rather than to be a slave to it. We recognize the need to propagate ideas and speculations as well as the need to form empirical situations for testing them. However, we believe in a working reciprocity between theory and method, and in a unity among the sciences; manuscripts should accentuate this interdisciplinary approach—either explicitly in their content, or implicitly within their point of view.

LEGAL STUDIES FORUM: An Interdisciplinary Journal

The LEGAL STUDIES FORUM, the official journal of the American Legal Studies Association, is published to promote humanistic, critical, and interdisciplinary research and teaching in legal studies, with a non-exclusive focus on common law. Published quarterly and employing a blind review selection process, the FORUM presents imaginative, provocative articles that approach the study of the legal system from a non-technical and value-conscious viewpoint. Articles are predominantly essays about the legal system, but space is allocated to articles about legal pedagogy in non-professional legal studies programs. Occasional thematic issues address topics in the Forum's range of interests; recent symposia have included "Law and the South African Legitimacy Crisis" and "Legal Reelism: The Hollywood Film as Legal Text." This journal also reviews recent books that seek to present philosophical, historical, linguistic, and critical perspectives on law and the operation of the legal system.
